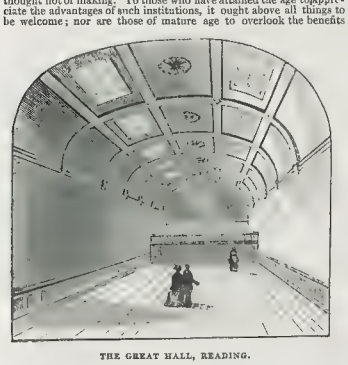
The Worcester is a beautiful model, and reflects great credit on those who have constructed her. She has been towed to Sheerness, where her masts, &c., will be put on board. Her armament will consist of 32 2 pounders, medium guns. Great praise is due to the authorities of the Dock-yard, and more particularly to Sir John Hill, under whose directions and superintendence the launch took place. Accommodation was afforded to thousands of persons in the Dock-yard, and order was so well preserved that no crowding was necessary, and all accidents were avoided. The immediate cause of the launch of the Worcester is not from any probability of her services being required at the present moment, but simply on account of the ship on which she was built being required for the construction of a first-rate war steamer, which is to be forthwith commenced. The vessel in question is to be one of the largest calibre ever built, her length exceeding by twenty-five feet that of the largest 120-gun ship in her Majesty's navy. She is to be called the Terrible, and her engines will be of 800-horse power.

NEW PUBLIC BUILDING AT READING.

NEW PUBLIC ROOMS, AT READING.

On the 24th instant, the building in part appropriated to the use of the Scientific Institute of the town of Reading, of which we give a view, will be opened to the members, in the mode usually followed in such proceedings. And most gratifying those proceedings are at all times and in all places, whether in this thickly-peopled centre of civilization, England, with a constitution and a history the growth of a national existence of nearly a thousand years, or on the distant shores of New Zealand, where the white man is yet the neighbour of the savage, and where the axe of the settler will not for many years cease to resound. It may almost be a question in which place the happy union of men for the purpose of mutual, or, it may be, self-instruction, is calculated to do the greatest amount of good. Here, the total and entire neglect of all governments to provide for the education of the people, has thrown them upon their own resources -by their own exertions they have devised the means of procuring themselves intellectual advantages. But it has frequently been at a late period in the history of every locality always too late to remedy the evil of a great—far too great a portion of the surrounding population having been suffered to grow up in ignorance. The work has been begun at the "eleventh hour," among a generation not prepared to look on intellectual gratification as a solace and delight, but trained to regard it with indifference. For them was the lamp of knowledge kindled in vain: it was "the light shining in darkness, and the darkness beholding it not." But the young of the present the unborn of future generations—must not be sacrificed to the errors, the prejudices, the sad neglect of the past. For them must the provision be made which their predecessors thought not of making. To those who have attained the age to appreciate the advantages of such institutions, it ought above all things to be welcome; nor are those of mature age to overlook the benefits



THE GREAT HALL, READING.

they offer; they may be busied with their everyday occupations, but these require sometimes to be thrown aside. There may be over-much application, as well as too little; and the former, which is an error, is much more common in England than the latter, which is a grave fault. There is a wholesome truth in the lines of Wordsworth:—

> The world is too much with us—soon and late—
> Getting and spending, we lay our powers waste.

It therefore behoves us to beware of this "overmuch" anxiety for what, though it is the means of living, is not the great end of life itself—which is rather the exercise—and the developing that we may exercise—the faculties that lie within us—though but too often they are suffered to "rust unused."

In all places, in all times, and to all ages, the uniting together of men for the purposes of mental improvement, is an object to be encouraged when it yet exists only in intention, and on which any locality is to be congratulated when it is carried out to a successful fulfilment, as in the case of the town of Reading, whose Institute we hope will long continue to flourish, and produce all the fruits that can be desired. Every society of this kind is a new centre from which the beneficial influences of science and literature spread forth among the population in the midst of which it is placed; it affords opportunities of cultivating both to many who before did not possess them, and for those who do not require such aids—whose more ample means and more happy lot have placed those aids in their own power—surely it is not too much to require of them that they come forward with the support they can so well give, as an acknowledgment of what they have plentifully received. Nor would such assistance be exclusively a donation: they might also enjoy some of the benefits of the Institution, though the facilities it offers might not be to them so necessary to others. But we need hardly spend much time, or occupy much space, in pleading the cause of refinement and intelligence against ignorance and the barbarism which ignorance ever ensures. He must know little of the condition of society who does not perceive that there is a vast amount of barbarism among us, cultivated as we are, rich, and civilised, and powerful, as we think ourselves. No one need fear the world will become too wise, or too refined. There is dreadful destitution among large masses of society—a destitution which is divided from the competence of property, and the independence ensured by the industrious exercise of skilled labour, by many shades and degrees of poverty, all of which render the attainment of anything like education difficult—to those who are totally destitute impossible; and that destitution will always engender a frightful amount of the ignorance, which, to judge by the indifference, or actual hostility, shown by many to any attempt to remove it, there are some, it seems, consider a blessing; but they labour under a dreadful error. The danger to property and law lies in the very ignorance they foster, for "he who is not with us is against us, and he who gathereth not together scattereth." How should men respect the rights of property, or revere the sanctity of the law, when they are incapacitated by ignorance from understanding the nature of one, or the operation of the other? Let every one then who is anxious to improve himself, or to effect something towards the improvement of others, do what he can to support such institutions as this; he will not be without his reward.

The neat and commodious edifice at Reading is situated in London-street, a central part of the town, and was completed about a month ago. The elevation is in the pure Grecian-Ionic style, after the beautiful example of the Temple of Minerva Polias, in the Acropolis of Athens. It consists of a stylobate or base, next the street, of solid granite, about five feet high: from which rises the façade, comprising two Ionic columns, above thirty feet in height (attached, as in the Grecian example), with elaborately carved capitals and fluted shafts; and two square columns, with the capitals and bases peculiar to the order. These four columns are surmounted by a proportionate entablature, finishing with a pediment. Between the columns are the requisite doorways, with suitable dressings; the doorway being in the centre of the lower floor, and approached by a flight of steps. The roof of the large hall is elliptic, divided into compartments, with ornamental brackets, &c., and flowers in the centre. A beautiful soft and equal light is introduced through cast-iron ornamental sashes placed in the compartments, and filled with ground glass. The whole of the apartments—waiting and committee rooms, vestibules, kitchen, cellarage, &c.—are admirably arranged, and reflect great credit upon the architect, Mr. W. Brown, of Reading.

The corner-stone of the edifice was laid by Miss Mitford, the authoress of "Our Village," on the 31st of August, 1842, in the presence of a large concourse of ladies and gentlemen resident in the town and neighbourhood, a clever oration being delivered on the occasion by Dr. Cowan, president of the Literary and Scientific Institution. The silver trowel used for the above purpose was subsequently presented to Miss Mitford by R. Bacon, Esq., with a suitable address.

The building is intended for general purposes; the hall being well adapted for concerts, balls, lectures, meetings, &c., and capable of accommodating 1,000 persons. The rooms in front are partially occupied by the Literary, Scientific, and Mechanics' Institution, the largest, on the first floor (nearly 30 feet square) being a public reading room. This institution is under the especial patronage of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and (thanks to the judicious management of its able and zealous officers) is one of the most flourishing societies at present in existence. The Essay and Discussion Class, founded by the honorary secretary, Mr. G. Grossmith, alone embraces 100 members. Dr. Cowan is the president for the ensuing year; and Charles Stephens, Esq., of Earley Court, the treasurer. The building will be opened by a public dinner in the spacious hall, on the 24th instant, at which some of the first literary men of the day will be present. The dinner will be followed by a public soirée, a concert, and a ball, to be held in commemoration of the opening, during the same week.

DISCOVERY OF ANCIENT COINS.—On the 1st of this month a countryman named Jonathan Hodges, of Keasne, while ploughing on the side of a hill, found an oval copper vessel, containing 4,350 silver coins, and fragments of different vases. About 300 of these coins are Anglo-Saxon, Danish and Norwegian, of Kings Ethelred, Canute, Harold, Hardicanute, Edward, and Sweyn Erickson. The others are German, chiefly of the cities of Cologne, Magdeburg, Mayne, Strasburg, Augsburg, &c. They are all of the 10th and 11th centuries, and the whole appear to have been buried in the ground towards the close of the 11th century. There are only two copes (Arabian coins) among them. Two other peasants have found a coin and a clasp.

The Marquis of Tweeddale has been unfortunate enough to lose a new carriage, which miscarried on its way from the ship to the shore at Madras. The Star remarks on this—"whether this unlucky swamping of a state chariot bears any ominous allusion to a like consequence as regards the chariot of the state, we are not able to say; but his Lordship at any rate may console himself with the reflection, that as he ordered it out for the Madras Roads it has safely reached its destination." Thus it appears that the only use likely to be made of his Lordship's carriage is as a vehicle for a joke.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE;

THE SISTERS.

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

By HENRY COCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "VALENTINE VOX," "STANLEY THORN," ETC.

CHAPTER XVII

THE REUNION.

ALMOST immediately after Sir Arthur's death, Fred. and Lucrece, with her infant, arrived and having been warmly received by all save Caroline, who had retired, Lucrece went to her room, with the view of greeting and consoling her, while Fred. impatiently urged the departure of Dr. Hawtree, who had promised to take him to Alice at once.

Greville—having heard this promise given, and wishing for some reasonable excuse to leave the house, in which he really was not at all happy—now endeavoured to make Dr. Hawtree understand, by a variety of ingenious observations, that he should feel extremely glad of an invitation to go with them; and as the Doctor knew that Alice had before been amazed by illustrations of his one grand principle, and was anxious that the reunion of the lovers should not be one of tears, he invited him to dine with them immediately, at the same time, with great consideration, that they might as well all go together, which met Greville's views precisely; and, therefore, having taken leave of Charles—who then wished for no other society than that of Lucrece—they together left the house

"Now, Fred.," said Dr. Hawtree, as they proceeded towards his residence, "although this is a mournful time, your meeting with Alice must be gay. We have lost our dear friend Cleveland, but we must not, Fred., lose her."

"There's surely no danger of that?" cried Fred.

"Why, she must be recluse. Her spirits have been of late dreadfully depressed; and although she was in a high state of rapture for a time when she heard of your coming back to England, she soon became thoughtful and gloomy again; in fact, melancholy seems to have settled upon her soul—that species of melancholy which fleeting society tends but to confirm, but which constant cheerfulness must soon remove. Therefore be light and lively, and most playful when you perceive she is most inclined to be dull."

"Then we had better not allude to poor Sir Arthur's death this evening?"

"No; if we can possibly avoid it. She will ask after him, doubtless: but the subject must be evaded in some way. She had much better hear of it in the morning."

"Father," said Fred, "you understand? Sir Arthur must not be mentioned this evening before Alice."

"Very well, my boy," replied Greville. "If it must not, it must not, and therefore, of course, will not be mentioned."

"What haven't you got over that yet?" cried Fred., with all that irreverence in which sons will indulge when they conceive themselves to be wiser than their fathers.

"Got over what, my boy"

"Why that predestinarian propensity of yours. You should have been with us at Verdun. We should have cured you there. Charles and I were frequently on the subject."

"And the result, I find, is, that Charles has become a convert."

"Charles become a convert!" cried Fred., whom the notion highly pleased. "When he becomes a convert, I'll join you."

"Well, there's no accounting for these things: they are all hidden mysteries to us; but it strikes me that the time will come when there will be but very few men of sense to be converted. But don't you think," he added, "that Charles is looking ill?"

"He or I," replied Dr. Hawtree—"very ill. He, too, must be roused, or he'll become hypochondriacal. I see that, clearly."

"Now," said Fred., on reaching the house, "shall I go up with you, or will you announce me first?"

"Go into the parlour," replied the Doctor, "and I'll let her know that you are there."

Fearing with impatience to see her, Fred. did so, and the Doctor proceeded with Greville to the drawing-room, at the door of which Alice was anxiously standing in the fond hope—knowing that none one was with him—of its being no other than Fred.

"Has he not yet arrived in town?" she cried in an energetic whisper, when she saw that it was Greville."

"Who, my dear—who?" said the Doctor, with a smile.

"Frederick! Frederick!"

"Oh, yes, he's here. You'll find him in the parlour.

Her heart for the moment ceased to beat; and, having looked at her father with a fond appreciation of his motive, she kissed him, and rushed from the room.

The parlour-door opened. Fred. flew to embrace her. Their names were pronounced in expressions of joy, and in an instant they were locked in each other's arms.

"Oh, Alice!" cried Fred., when his lips were disengaged, "what happiness is this!"

"Frederick!" fervently exclaimed Alice, "I could now die with pleasure."

Fred. gazed at her intently for a moment, and, remembering the doctor's injunction—which, happy as he was, he resolved to obey—said playfully, "Well, then, let us die together. I'll make my will at once. I have nothing to leave—but a will looks respectable. Alice," he added, as she sluggishly smiled, "we shall live, I hope, many, many happy years yet. Certainly, this is the very time at which I should most like to die."

"Dear Frederick, I do not mean that I should like to die; but, in fact, I feel so happy that I scarcely know what I mean."

"But, my sweetest girl, we must be gay as well as happy. Look at me. I am, of course, extremely handsome—but we'll let that aside—that's admitted: the question is, do I look as if I were happy?"

"You do, dear Fred., and I am overjoyed to see it."

"Very well, well, of course, take that for granted. Now let me look at you"

It may here be stated, as a remarkable fact, that they ever had no sooner met than he kissed her. It was done, of course, on the impulse of the moment: but it was done; and the only excuse he had to offer was that he could'nt help it! which was very extraordinary.

"I perceive," he continued, "a slight tinge of sadness shading these beautiful features of yours; and yet you are happy—most happy—overjoyed. Up to this moment I never imagined sadness to be indicative of joy. But, without dwelling on that, let us turn to this," he added, drawing her pensive from his breast. "Now, here we have the semblance of a lovely girl, in the bloom of youth and beauty. Her eyes, you perceive, are sparkling with pleasure, her brow is smooth and clear; her lips—precisely the lips I love—appear to be formed for kissing and smiling: while her swelling bosom seems fraught with delight. Now where is this address? Look at the ensemble. Can you perceive anything like it developed?"

"I can perceive that you are a dear, kind creature," said Alice, "and I am not quite sure that I do not love you more than ever."

"That may be all very well for an English compliment; but let that pass while I compare this critically with the original. Well," he added, after a pause, "it's very like—really—an admirable likeness! Way, that's very strange! Oh, I perceive—you are looking like yourself again! That shade of sadness spoiled all."

"You are, indeed, very dear to me, Frederick" said Alice, and immediately burst into tears.

"Well, this is one of the strangest anomalies in nature. Let us walk to that bookcase. It is absolutely necessary that I should have this matter cleared up. Let me see. Oh, here is a dictionary now then. Now stop, here it is: 'Weep, to shed tears, to bewail, to lament, to mourn.' That's sufficiently explicit. What follows? You tell me that I am dear to you, and while you tell me that, you weep—that is, you bewail, you lament, in fact, mourn over it."

"Yes, that is not a fair inference; and, if it be, it is not a correct one. I wept, I know not why, except that my heart was too full of happiness. They were not tears of sadness, but of joy. Indeed, dear Fred, I am not sad—I have been."

"Oh, I have heard of it; and even that appears extraordinary. You creatures—I speak of you in the aggregate—feel more for us than we feel for ourselves. A calamity assails us Well, what is it to you? We learn to suffer—and you suffer also very well."

"Is not that one of our most amiable traits?"

"It may be amiable; but it's altogether wrong, and, therefore, ought to be rectified, especially as our sufferings are invariably increased by the fact of our knowing that you suffer too. This, however, is an offence which we are always disposed to forgive. But, while we [illegible] have ceased to suffer [illegible] when we are exactly in health, penni- [illegible] and [illegible] Therefore, dear, dear Alice, be sad no more."

"I will not. I am not and now I"

"But smile, my sweet girl; smile! There, always look thus, and you know not how happy you will make me."

"Well, I'll endeavour to do so; but you must not scold me any more now, I have so much to ask you. You have not said a word about yourself, nor have I inquired for a single soul! Lucrece and the dear little baby, and"——

"Yes, I'll tell you all about them by and by. But is it not time for you to think about dressing for dinner?"

"Good gracious," she exclaimed, on looking at her watch; "I had no idea of its being so late. But, baby—oh! how I long to see him!—what is his name?"

"Way, his name is Charles Stanley, but we call him Mossy!"

"Mossy! what an odious name to give the little dear. I'll not have him called Mossy."

"Well, you must speak to Lucrece about the matter. But as the interval, dear Alice, be cheerful—be gay. I need not tell you how I love you, but that I do love you dearly, be sure. Bless you, my sweet girl," he added, again embracing her, "bless you!"

He then fondly led her from the parlour, and they proceeded together to the drawing [illegible] where after another embrace of course, they parted

"Why," said the Doctor, when Alice had left him and Greville, "how did you find her?"

"Oh," replied Fred., "I've no fear of her now."

"Did you not perceive in her countenance a settled expression of melancholy "

"Yes I did; but I'll very soon cause that to vanish. She's not, however, nearly so much altered as I imagined it."

"Was she at all wandering, or incoherent in her remarks "

"No not in the slightest degree."

"In cases of this kind, those young dogs, Greville, make the best physicians after all."

"Why, it's natural," said Greville, with the most perfect coolness, "and Nature can't be beaten by Art. I have a great deal of Nature "

"So have I," rejoined the Doctor, with a smile. "But you must not relax, Fred., keep her cheerful, and all will be well."

"Fred.," said Greville, "we have been speaking of Lucrece. What's the matter with her?"

"Oh, consider the fatigue she has endured "

"But she looks as thin and pale and wretched "

"You forget how long she has had to nurse Charles, and how hopeless she it as for an affectionate wife in fief otherwise than wretched when she conceives her fond husband to be making man his years."

"But that is all over now "

"It is not in her judgment: nor is it in mine. And if it were, we cannot expect the lines which grief and apprehension have established to be effectually removed by a sudden gust of joy. The boisterous cheek and the hollow eye may radiate for a moment, and lill up the traces of woe, but the effects of sorrow in all such cases long outlive the cause."

"Well, it's true we can't account for these things; but it's lamentable, nevertheless, that people haven't a little more philosophy."

"Philosophy, father, is excellent per se: the germ of an admirable theory; but when a fond woman sees the man whom she adores sinking fast—when she believes that the infant at her breast will soon be fatherless—we must not talk to her about philosophy"

Greville, however, would not be thus moved from the ground upon which he had taken his stand; he was ready to admit that human sorrow was to a certain extent inevitable, and that weakness was peculiarly perceptible in a woman he was ready to admit also that sorrows would have borne up against, have completed otherwise if Lucrecia had; but from his point—namely, that it was lamentable that people did not bear every thing with fortitude—that nothing could be averted—he declined his determination not to stir a single inch, and on this point was held that he must not talk to her about philosophy.

He proudly felt that he had triumphed.

After now re-entered the room, and with a smile which manifestly gladdened the Doctor's heart, and when dinner was announced he gave her to Fred., who, he perceived in a moment, was pursuing the proper course, and with as he led her from the room, made her still more cheerful by playfully reproducing the miniature, and expressing his conviction that the likeness never appeared to be so faithful as then.

During dinner, life in Yorke formed the topic of conversation, and Fred. related a variety of amusing accidents, illustrative chiefly of the peculiar characteristics developed by the highly indignant Frenchmen, whom pirates in the neighbourhood of Yorke, the excitement, the rumo, the grin, the splutter, and the shrug, to the very life but the innumerable scenes of misery he had witnessed he kept entirely out of view

MANCHESTER ATHENÆUM.

Within the past week, some very gratifying proceedings have taken place in that great centre of manufacturing skill and industry—Manchester. The Athenæum in that town has requi ed assistance, its funds having sank lower than, in such a place, they ought to have done. In aid of them, what may be called a "Revival" has been held, marked by a success and a degree of enthusiasm almost unexampled. We need not speak of the long list of noble patrons of this institution, except to point out that they did not revive it from impending decay, thus proving that no patronage, however high, can compensate for the solid and permanent support which the great body of the people, the middle and working classes, must give such societies for themselves. Nor can we notice the bazaar with its sale of work, the produce of fair fingers, but to thank them for their zeal; we wish to draw more attention to the speeches delivered at the soirée, which is described as having been a most brilliant assembly. Charles Dickens—he needs no adjective of praise before his name, no word of dignity after it—presided as chairman, and the meeting was attended by Mr. Cobden, Mr. B. Disraeli, Mr. Milner Gibson, Mr. Brotherton, Dr. Playfair, Mr. Kershaw, and other well known names. From the address of the chairman, which was exceedingly appropriate, we extract two passages out of many others of equal merit. After exposing the fallacy of those who dread the advancement and the spread of intelligence, he turns to the effects of ignorance; he says:—

I should be glad to hear such people's estimate of the comparative danger of a little learning, and a vast amount of ignorance. I should be g ad to know which they consider the most prolific parent of misery and crime. Descending a little lower in the social scale, I should be glad to assist them in their calculation, by carrying them to certain gaols and mighty refuges I know of, where my own heart dies within me when I see thousands of immortal creatures condemned, without alternative or choice to tread, not what our great poet calls, "the primrose path to the everlasting bonfire," but one of jagged fl nts and stones, laid down by brutal ignorance, and held together like solid rock by years of the most wicked actions.

The hardening process of vice and ignorance has seldom been better described. He then speaks of the effects of intelligence and education:—

The man who lives, from day to day, by the daily exercise, in his sphere, of hands or head, and seeks to improve himself in such a place, acquires for himself that property of soul which has in all times upheld struggling man to a degree, but self-made man especia ly and always. He secures for himself that faithful companion which, while it has ever lent the light of its countenance to men of rank and minds who have deserved it, has even shed its greatest consolations on men of low estate and almost hopeless means. It took its patient seat beside Sir Walter Raleigh, in his dungeon-study in the Tower; and it had its head upon the block with More. But it did not disdain to outwatch the stars with Ferguson, the shepherd s boy; it walked the streets in mean nature with Crabbe; it was a poor barber here in Lancashire with Arkwright; it was a tallow-chandler's lad with Franklin; it worked at shoe-making with Bloomfield in his garret; it followed the plough with Burns; and, high above the noise of loom and hammer, it whispers courage, at this day, in ears that I could name in Sheffield and Manchester. The more the man who improves his leisure in such a place learns, the better, gentler, kinder man he must become.

Can any one deny the truth of the principle, or the force of the contrast? We leave it to have its full effect by general application.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, Oct. 11, 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—It is with some slight embarrassment that I now sit down to describe the fashions prevalent at this moment in Paris, as, in point of fact, our elegantés have as yet hardly commenced thinking of autumnal fashions, though the costumes of our mornings and evenings should be a warning to us that we can no longer expect the moderate temperature we have been hitherto enjoying. I shall, therefore, confine myself to a description of the costume I still see worn by fashionable people, leaving you to form your own conclusions of their appropriateness to the season. I will then mention to you a most delicious peignoir of muslin, trimmed all round, is also on both sides of the front of it with a deep lace flounce, surmounted with two small double plomb gathers of rose taffety ribbon, the corsage high, open in front to the waist, and gathered, trimmed with a piece of lace, forming a band, and descending towards that on the skirt. The sleeves, moderately wide, are puffed at the top and at the wrist. The under petticoat is worked in columns upon the front, and is made of transparent rose taffety. Another morning costume that I have observed was a redingote of lilac taffety, open in front, and trimmed on either side by a frill of the same material. The corsage half high upon the shoulders, open en cœur in front, trimmed with frills behind, and laced in front to a point. The neck-kerchief is of muslin, and the sleeves orientals, narrow above, but becoming wider from the elbow to about the middle of the fore-arm, and trimmed with a frill; the bottom skirt is of Scotch batiste, trimmed with a deep flounce of lace, surmounted with rich embroidery. I should also speak of a blue pouli de soie robe, trimmed with three rows of passementerie, the corsage plain, high and pointed, the sleeves plain, with crevées in muslin down to the elbow.

Evening dress I have seen nothing handsomer than those I am now about to describe to you. But I should here premise, that I can hardly offer them to you as the modes which are decidedly adopted for the season, but only as having appeared upon the persons of those who are considered to possess exemplary taste. The first of these is a robe in lilac barege, trimmed on the skirt with six tucks, of which the first commences at about a foot from the corsage, which is open, and brought to a rounded point; the sleeves are short; a canezon of muslin, with intervals of Valenciennes lace, and trimmed all round it with broad lace, completes the costume. The second was a robe of rose-coloured muslin, trimmed with a deep flounce, mounted with a frill à la Vielle of similar material; the corsage coulisé at the neck, the sash long, and formed of rose-coloured taffety ribbon, with short plain sleeves; and this dress is worn with a mantle of English application lace, which gives it a very dressy and becoming tour ensemble.

Until something more decided takes place in our weather, I fear we shall have no settled fashions that can be relied upon. When, however, that event shall occur, which I hope will be in the course of the week, you shall hear from me. Till then, adieu.

JAMES WYLIE, THE CELEBRATED DRAUGHT PLAYER.

As we have the pleasure of including among our patrons a great number of Chess Players, we are persuaded the annexed sketch will be read by them with especial interest—akin to that which they take in "the noble game."

James Wylie was born in Edinburgh, on the 8th of July, 1822, and brought up in Kilmarnock. When a boy he was principally employed in herding cows. At the age of 15 he began to play at draughts: during the winter season, he played two hours every night, and soon became a good player. During the spring following, he went to Edinburgh, played with all the best players in the city, and beat them with the greatest ease, during his stay with them, which was upwards of a month. His first match was with Mr. Steel, of Kirkconnel, for £40, in Jan., 1839, in which Steel was defeated. Steel challenged him again for £40, in April, 1839, and was defeated a second time. His next match was with Mr. Anderson, of Carluke, near Glasgow, July, 1839, for £5, when Anderson won with a trifling advantage; he played with Anderson a second time, and was again defeated. The next match was with Mr. Price, of Manchester, August, 1840, for £100, in which Price was defeated. In May, 1841, he gave Mr. Price 7 games in 13 for £25, and Price was defeated a second time. The next match was with Mr. Muirhead, of Macklesfield, for £10, when he undertook to win 12 games before Mr. Muirhead would gain 6 draws—Muirhead was defeated! Wylie was then matched with Mr. Lindop, of Sheffield, in May, 1841, for £100, for the first 13 games—he giving Lindop the draws to count in his favour, when Lindop was defeated! In June, 1841, Lindop again challenged Wylie for £60, at the same odds, when Wylie was defeated. Two months after, he challenged Lindop, or any other person in England, the first 13 games, giving 9 games to start with, from £50 to any sum:—Lindop accepted the challenge for £65, and was defeated! only winning 1 game. About a month after, Wylie challenged any man in the world for from £100 to £500, and was taken by Anderson, of Carluke, for £200, to be played in May, 1842; but, in consequence of some affliction in Anderson's family, the match was put off, and has not yet been played. Wylie's next match was with Mr. Mattison, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, in December, 1842, for £10; the first 13 games drawn to count in Mattison's favour, when Mattison was defeated—without drawing a game! Wylie is now matched to play Anderson, of Carluke, for any sum not below £50, Anderson having his choice; and this match is expected to come off in about two months. (From a Correspondent.)

THE STATE PROSECUTIONS.

A journalist frequently experiences a difficulty in finding a subject for remark; and sometimes, though less frequently, his only difficulty is that of selecting one out of the many topics that press themselves imperatively upon his attention. The latter seems to be the case at present with most of our contemporaries; they are called on to select, not to find or to make, and their almost unanimous choice falls upon the most engrossing question of the day, discussed in all companies, talked of at all hours, meeting everybody in all places. Break in, as a third, on the conversation of any two men of your acquaintance, and the chances are that Ireland is the topic of their talk, and O'Connell "the last man in their mouths." There is nothing extraordinary in this; the periods at which any evil reaches a crisis, or passes from one stage into another, are always those that excite most interest, though they are not always those which most deserve it. Those who looked beyond the everyday surface of things with a mere glance at which all are too apt to be satisfied—must have seen that the present stage of the contest between the law and those who were evading it, between the Government and those who were holding it up to scorn, was inevitable. But there are very many whom the change from quiet sufferance to busy repression—from the passive to the active mood—on the part of the Executive—has taken by surprise. This, however, will wear off—like all other surprises—and the permanent feeling it will leave will be one likely to direct men's minds more than ever to the real merits of the case. The late events prove, beyond a doubt, that both parties are in earnest, and the prosecutions of those who may now be called the state offenders in Ireland, will furnish a series of discussions, having a national interest as far as individuals are affected by them, but involving also questions of general and national importance.

All these differences and dissensions are to be deplored; whatever may be their ultimate results, at present they are evils. But as we are bound to deduce as much good as possible from the circumstances in which we are placed, we are glad to turn from the immediate collision of parties to consider the manner in which it has been conducted. It has proved, beyond all doubt, the influence of the law—considered as a power existing beyond, and irrespective of, parties and persons. There is a marked—and a very favourably marked—progress in society in this respect; to appreciate it we have only to compare the present with the past, to compare how past governments have acted against those who gave it cause for putting out its strength, and how that power was resisted by those against whom it was put in force. Popular discontent, popular leaders, public assemblies, for obtaining redress for what are considered public wrongs—violent harangues, the outward sign of inward feeling still more violent; none of these are things peculiar to the days that are passing over us. They have all existed in different shapes in almost every age; no form of government is exempt from popular discontents all have experienced them. A state of perfect contentment would be that normal health of the body politic, which is perhaps in theory possible, but which certainly is not found in political or social systems, more than perfect health can be met with in the individual human frame. Not one man out of ten thousand has a constitution so perfect that it can be pronounced absolutely free from ailment. There is either some malady, or the germs of it, and of the most perfect it can only be said that they are less diseased than others. It is so with states; none are free from evils, and all do, more or less, give vent to their sense of suffering. In proportion as the ruling power is wise, it will perceive their seat and their cause; if it is benevolent as well as wise, it will apply the remedy, as well as discover the evil; if it is merely strong—but neither wise nor benevolent it will silence the cry of complaint by crushing the complainers. And then? Why that which is a blending of folly and crime will ultimately produce the fruits of crime and folly in all ages horrible, cruel, bloody, and unsparing revenge delivered only till the day when the oppressed become the strongest. As the policy that represses the manifestations of discontent has always been the readiest, it has been the one most frequently resorted to; where the disposition to inquire and alleviate exists in addition to it, it is the best for peace and order of some kind, though it be but the consequence of compulsion, is absolutely necessary. Whether the latter exist or not, the former is always resorted to; and the manner in which this has been done in times past, and that of which we are now the witnesses, is the point to which we wish to direct attention.

Governments will always do, for their own convenience or security, just as much as the people will submit to without resisting, or permit without remonstrance. Wealth and civilization are not in themselves security against political thraldom, and a people unfitted for liberty will never remain long unenslaved. It is the temper of the people, then, that modifies and controuls the exercise of the ruling power, whatever it may be. Englishmen had wrung the habeas corpus from the monarchical power long before the lettres de cachet were abolished in France. But governments have been very strong and very unscrupulous in using their strength in England, down to times comparatively recent. During the last half of the past century and the first five-and-twenty years of the present one there was, from time to time, a struggle between the rulers and the ruled, as if the prerogative scarcely knew the limits of its powers, or the people those of their rights. When Wilkes—who "agitated" the City as effectually as O'Connell does Ireland—was prosecuted by the government of the day, the Ministry aggravated the Opposition against it by the "general warrants" which it issued, the legality of which was contested. When it proceeded against Sir Francis Burdett, for "inflammatory language," it forthwith committed him to the Tower. What is the difference between the circumstances of the cases, to cause the great difference in the mode in which the chief actors are treated? Simply the change in the people and the times: both parties have more confidence in the law, and therefore more respect for it. Those who enforce it do not doubt its efficacy, and therefore carefully observe its forms. Those against whom it is enforced feel that there is in the integrity of the bench and the intelligence of juries a sufficient security that the law will not be perverted or abused. If we look at the accounts of all the circumstances attending the commencement of the "prosecutions," they seem conducted with so much punctilio, so much mutual regard for the "convenience" of the parties on each side, that it seems more like the "polite attention" of two gentlemen about to treat on some affair that they expect to be mutually advantageous, than the conflict in which one side must stand or fall under the formidable charge of "conspiracy" against the state—a charge hardly mentioned in our annals except in very uncomfortable juxtaposition with heading and hanging, and the superfluous barbarity of "quartering." "Revolutions," said a French statesman, "are not made with rose-water;" we are not sure but state prosecutions may be sprinkled with it; the following account reads

> As if it should be writ on satin
> Where not a single accent sounds in vain.

> About half-past nine o'clock this morning, Saturday, the 14th, Mr. Kemmis, the crown solicitor, waited on Mr. O'Connell, and presented him a paper intimating that the Government had instituted proceedings against him and his son Mr. J. O'Connell, M.P., on a charge of "conspiracy and other misdemeanors." The communication went on to desire that Mr. O'Connell would indicate a time at which he and Mr. J. O'Connell should enter bail before Mr. Justice Burton, themselves in £1000 each, and two sureties for each in £500, to answer any charge that may be preferred against them by her Majesty's Attorney-General, on the first day of next term. After some conversation between Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Kemmis, who, we understand, acted with the greatest courtesy, the hour was fixed upon to enter bail at the house of Mr Justice Burton.

Could anything be more considerate? Here are no arrests, no warrants, no ill-looking myrmidons of the law in attendance—for we take the crown solicitor to be a gentleman, exclusive of the operation of the act of Parliament that makes him one—no scene—nothing resembling an effect. The intention of the Government was "intimated" only, not rudely announced. It looks as if the "proceedings" would be dropped if Mr. O'Connell had the least objection to them, but that they would go on if he would condescend to be prosecuted. He names the hour at which the first step may be taken; the mighty march of the law awaits the convenience of him it is meant to punish. The rest of the account is in keeping; there is nothing harsh about it, nothing that can jar on the nerves. The scene of the transaction, the opening of a contest of vital interest, of which we know not yet the result what was it? The formalities that fetter the agitator for a time as securely as if he were bound by material chains, were neither a gloomy ante-chamber of the Castle, with sentries at the door, nor a law court with its cold and somewhat grim propriety—but "a beautifully decorated drawing-room, which contains a large collection of pictures of the rarest and finest character." Thus, the outward circumstances of a momentous proceeding are changed according to the changes that have passed over society. But they would not be worth noticing did they not indicate an inward modification in the spirit with which the law is put in operation. A Government cannot now exhibit that ferocity that too often accompanied the exercise of its power; it is calm and earnest, but vindictive. That it will use every means the constitution affords it we may rest assured; but it cannot go beyond them—cannot create new powers for the occasion—will not venture to pervert those which exist. On the other hand, there is no resistance to the instrument put in operation; there is as prompt an obedience to the mandate as if a prosecution was one of the parts of the scheme in which the agitator is engaged a thing whose occurrence was calculated on, and to be met like a check in any other undertaking. And let no one imagine that because the process has been so tame and common-place, has worn such an everyday aspect, that the law itself is weaker than of old. The quietude with which it has operated is one of the greatest proofs of its strength. In no other country of Europe would such an agitation as that which has so long existed in Ireland have arisen; but could it have been aroused, it would long ere this have swept away the barriers both of law and social order. In France, an excitement less deep in itself, and shared by fewer numbers, overturned the throne of Charles the Tenth, and sent him through the world for the second time an exile. And, as for the leader of the movement, he could not in France have kept Frenchmen from bloodshed and barricades, and at the present moment would have been a fugitive, or the head of a republic. In Prussia he would long since have been the inmate of a fortress-cell, for the Prussian King loves not bloodshed for political causes. In Russia, we cannot say what might have been the consequence of the present crisis to such a man Siberia, for life, may be taken as the mildest form of the expiation. Here the whole matter begins and ends in a day, and the people of England wait in confidence that the law will do justice between the parties, and preserve the peace of society unbroken. Thus is the consolation for the moment, but for the future that has yet to be provided for, and it is to be done effectually by far other measures than STATE PROSECUTIONS, which are but the necessity of the passing hour.

DUBLIN CASTLE - BIRMINGHAM TOWER.

The Castle of Dublin, as the seat of the Executive Government in Ireland, has, within the past week, been invested with unusual interest. The State Prosecutions against the leaders of the Repeal movement have made the Castle the focus of attraction. The yards have been crowded with three sets of persons, the prosecutors, counsel and deputations have invaded the precincts on more important business, and detachments of Dragoons have taken up their position in the Castle yard—all being in machine order, and each man wearing his haversack, containing a day's provision.

The court-yard of Dublin Castle, with its usual scene of ordinary guard, will be found engraved in our 9th number. We now present to our readers a view of the south front of the Castle, including what is called the Record Tower, which is now occupied by the records of Ulster King of Arms, those of the Parliament of Ireland, and of Birmingham Tower. The range of apartments to the west of the Tower are those of the Lord Lieutenant, looking to the Castle gardens and St. Patrick's Hall, at the end of which is Bermingham Tower, rebuilt by Lord Howard, the lower part of which is the Castle kitchen; the second floor, the Round room, commonly called the Board of Green Cloth; and the room above is that formerly appropriated to the custody of the records of Birmingham Tower, now divided into sleeping apartments.

The Record Tower was the dungeon or prison of the Castle of Dublin, and was coeval with its foundation; the walls are of great thickness, and built on a rock of black stone. It was formerly called the Ward Tower, and in it, to upwards of 300 years, were incarcerated all state prisoners. The last there confined were Arthur O'Connor, and his revolutionary companions, in the year 1794.

The history of the unfortunates imprisoned in this Tower would supply materials for as many stories as are to be found in the Arabian Nights; and many of them extremely romantic. The Tower has, it more recent times, been appropriated and fitted up for the safe custody of the records

DEFEAT OF THE REPEAL AGITATION.—ARREST OF MR. O'CONNELL.

On Saturday last Dublin was the scene of great excitement and anxiety in consequence of Mr. O'Connell and his son, Mr. John O'Connell, M.P., having been [illegible] and other misdemeanours." Shortly after the celebration of mass at the residence of Mr. O'Connell, at which the old gentleman learned counsel received the sacrament at about half-past nine o'clock on Saturday morning, Mr. [illegible] arrived at the solicitor, waited upon him, and presented to him a paper intimating that the government had instituted proceedings against him and his son, Mr. John O'Connell, M.P., and went on to desire that Mr. O'Connell would indicate a time at which he and Mr. John O'Connell should enter bail before Mr. Justice Burton. [illegible] that may be preferred against them by her Majesty's Attorney-General, on the first day of the next term. After some conversation between Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Kemmis, who acted with the greatest courtesy, the hour of three o'clock was fixed upon to enter bail at the residence of Mr. Justice Burton, in Stephen's green. Mr. Kemmis then withdrew. At eleven o'clock Mr. Justice Burton appeared in chamber, at the Four Courts, and remained for an hour, in accordance with his practice, to hear motions out of term. His lordship rose at twelve o'clock, and walked home. Many persons attended in the chamber on the supposition that some proceedings would take place in regard to the state prosecutions; but, of course, nothing was done, as the arrangement had been made for three o'clock in the afternoon. At a quarter to three o'clock, Mr. O'Connell, accompanied by John O'Connell, Esq., M.P., Daniel O'Connell, Jun., Esq., Cornelius M'Loughlin, and Jeremiah Dunn, arrived at the residence of Mr. Justice Burton. All the parties were shown into the beautifully decorated drawing-room, which contains a large collection of pictures of the rarest and most valuable character. Mr. Pierce Mahony, a solicitor for Mr. John O'Connell, having called upon the crown solicitor for copies of the informations, and being refused, the following notice was served upon him

"Pursuant to an act of parliament, 6 and 7 William IV., ch. 114, I hereby require and demand to have copies of the examination of the witnesses respectively, upon whose depositions respectively I have been this day held to bail; and I hereby enter payment of such reasonable sums for the same as may be demanded for same.

"Dated this 14th October, 1843.

"DANIEL O'CONNELL."

The like notice was served on the part of Mr. John O'Connell. A considerable crowd collected round the door, and shortly before the learned judge came into the apartment. Mr. Pierce Mahony, Mr. J. S. Close, and several other gentlemen entered. Mr. Kemmis and Mr. Bourne, the crown solicitors, and the learned [illegible] were in readiness, all the parties assembled in his lordship's study. Mr. O'Connell requested to see the information upon which the warrant was issued, and, having read it over, said he was sorry to enter into bail for the sum required, namely, two sureties in the sum of £2,500 each, and himself in £5,000. Mr. Kemmis said that the crown would not require the personal attendance of Mr. O'Connell, but that a special [illegible] would be required. Mr. O'Connell then left the room, and returned in a few minutes with his friend and medical friends around him. He and the learned judge shook hands warmly at the close of the proceedings. The bail bonds having been signed and sealed by Mr. Mahony, Daniel Mr. Bourne then said [illegible] about Mr. O'Connell's attendance, and [illegible] would [illegible] of the [illegible] Mr. O'Connell replied [illegible] and, if found, a day will be fixed for the trial of Mr. O'Connell before a petty jury, probably in the sittings after term.

After the bail had been perfected Mr. O'Connell issued the following address.—

[illegible]

Beloved Fellow Countrymen,—I announce to you that which you will hear from other quarters—namely, that I have given this day bail to answer a charge of conspiracy, and other misdemeanours. The first duty of my heart is to make this announcement in order to conjure the people, one and all, to observe the strictest and most perfect tranquillity. An attempt to disturb the public peace may be most dangerous—certainly would be criminal and mischievous. Attend, then, to the counsels of your friends, and [illegible] to the [illegible] of your enemies. Be [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] and ture of the remains appears to have been strangely overlooked, viz., that in the middle of the platform is the base of a superstructure in the shape of a cross, rising somewhat above the ground, and from 4 to 5 feet above the platform; it has been faced with square stones, some of which remain; the shaft of the cross running north and south, is 87 feet long and 7½ feet wide; the traverse is 22 feet in width, and 46 feet in length. The cruciform appearance is shewn in our first engraving; it is, however, less perceptible than in Boys's time (1792), through the constant ploughing and manuring of the ground for the growth of corn.

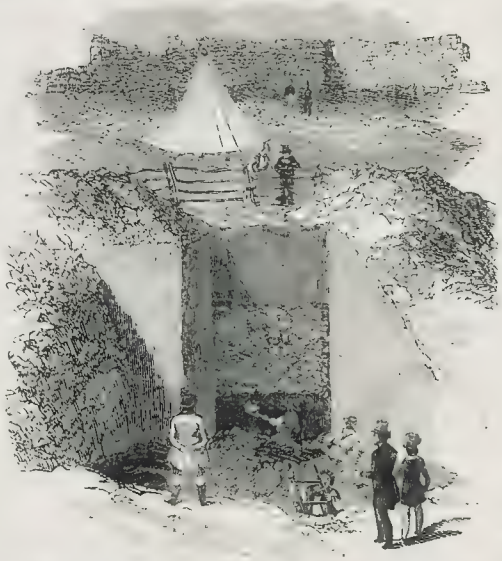
We gather from a gentleman resident in Sandwich, that in 1823 there were employed several workmen to dig beside the north-east edge of the platform, when they found it extending downward, as Boys had described it; "but what is still more extraordinary, in penetrating underneath this mass, they discovered a solid perpendicular wall, about 10 feet from the edge of the platform, and by which the platform itself is supported; this perpendicular wall extends downward 23 feet below the surface, and probably to a much greater depth; but at the time, the water flowed in and prevented any further excavation."—(From a brief "History of Richborough Castle," just published, and to be purchased at Sandwich, Ramsgate, and Dover.)

The very interesting work has just been renewed by Mr. Rolfe, who, on the 5th of last month, set six men to excavate the platform immediately opposite the extremity of the southern arm of the cross and its centre; the platform at this spot extends twenty-four feet beyond the end of the cross. Early in the afternoon, the men came to another excavation previously made, into which they descended and explored to a considerable distance a passage along the south and north sides of the platform. On the following day they were chiefly employed in clearing away the stones and clay mixed with sand at the south of the excavation, upon entering which they found it similar to the one made in 1823, with a wall twelve feet from the under edge of the platform, extending in a northerly direction fifty-four feet nine inches, and continuing round to the north side to the distance of thirty-five feet. On Friday, the 8th, they pursued their work; the extraordinary hardness of the mortar, and the breaking of the tools in consequence, did not in the least dispirit the men, and at the close of the day's work, Mr. Rolfe states he found they had made an aperture of three feet within the wall, five feet in height, and about the same width. On the following day, they found themselves five feet through the wall, at half-past five o'clock.

The works are now proceeding, and the second engraving shews a portion of the wall unearthed, with the details of the masonry, and a group of visitors curiously watching the workmen in their slow progress of about four inches per diem through the adamantine concrete. By some persons it is conjectured that these walls enclose a chamber, but we incline to the opinion that, with the platform, they formed a grand altar, which, being surmounted with a cross, seems strongly to indicate a high religious purpose on the part of the founder. There is, at each of the four angles of the masonry, a drain or passage from the face of the platform, the use of which remains to be ascertained. One of these passages is shown in our third engraving.



ENTRANCE TO THE NORTHERN CELLAR.

The whole work appears to be of Saxon masonry. Ethelbert the First, who ruled over Kent, had his royal palace at Richborough: and Augustine the monk, the apostle of Kent, with his companions, landed at Stonar (a little to the north-east of Sandwich), having been sent by Gregory, bishop of Rome; St. Augustine tarried here until Ethelbert gave him audience in his palace, where he prepared the mind of that monarch, in divers conferences, to abjure idolatry by professing the Christian faith. The pious king is known to have built a chapel after his conversion, on the spot where he had received the first tidings of the Gospel; and, although this chapel, together with the castle and city, were destroyed by the Danes, in this cruciform masonry may we not behold a memorial almost as immutable as the faith which it was constructed to commemorate? A rustic tradition indirectly favours this inference; and the writer of the pamphlet we have quoted, says with some show of reason, "Might it not have been St. Austin's Cross—a name which the people there, in Camden's time, misapplied to the crossings in the corn, but which might belong to this mass of masonry, raised perhaps to commemorate the happy arrival of St. Augustine in Britain, and his landing at the foot of this very hill?" As the work proceeds, we hope this inference may be strengthened; for it is altogether one of the most impressive antiquarian investigations that have ever awakened public attention. Hundreds of pages have been written to prove the particular spot on which Cæsar landed and encamped, which, Horsley tells us, "may now be washed away by the sea," but how much more interesting is it to identify thus massive work as a memorial of religious triumph, with its hallowed associations beaming far brighter in our history than the proudest conquest of any age or country. All the grandeur of the remains of the Roman dominion in Britain—all their strength, fitness, and splendour—sink before this subterranean symbol of the Christian faith.

Meanwhile, several relics of interest have been found in the course of the excavations at Richborough, including many bones of the seabuck. We have grouped a few specimens on the right and left corners of the page. These are portions of an axe, and a pair of shears, and fragments of the red Samian pottery; the fragment of a bowl, with the zig-zag ornament (one of the characteristic mouldings of Anglo-Saxon and Anglo-Norman architecture), is very remarkable. Three of the specimens at the corresponding corner of the page are also of red ware, but the fourth presents a higher finish—the ground being red, and the cross figure dark blue enamel, with a retouched pattern, and bright globules, and elsewhere is an indication of mother-of-pearl. In these relics we behold the debris of civilization for eighteen hundred years!

Returning to the locality of the first view, how many associations crowd upon us in the prospect: to the left lie Ramsgate and Pegwell Bay; in front, Sheldness and the Goodwin Flats; and in the distance, the Goodwin Sands: whilst, to the right, are the antique town of Sandwich and the Downs. Then, we reflect on the desolation of Stonar, and the filling up of the Portus Rutupensis, and the consequent rise and prosperity of Sandwich, once the most famous of all the English ports, but now, in its turn, comparatively decayed, and be[illegible] a miniature mausoleum. These are, indeed, the [illegible]ings of the "wheels of vicissitude," and to watch them makes us somewhat giddy.

WESTMINSTER BRIDGE.

REPAIR OF WESTMINSTER BRIDGE.

This metropolitan bridge is about to be so changed in its architectural details that a view of its superstructure, as it has existed for a century, may be acceptable to our readers; as well as a glance at the history of the bridge, which will throw some light upon its protracted and expensive repairs, which have been in progress for years past.

This bridge was the second erected across the Thames. It appears that attempts were made to obtain another bridge over the Thames besides that named "London," in the several reigns of Elizabeth, James I., Charles I. and II., and George I. but it was not until the year 1736 (10 Geo. II.), that parliament authorised the building a second bridge, namely, that at Westminster. Prior to this late, the only communication between Lambeth and Westminster was by a ferry-boat, near the palace-gate, the property of the Archbishop of Canterbury, to whom it was granted by patent under a rent of £30; as an equivalent for the loss of which, on the opening of the bridge, the see received the sum of £2,305.

SEVRES CASKET, PRESENTED BY LOUIS PHILIPPE TO QUEEN VICTORIA.

By the act of parliament passed in 1736, nearly 200 commissioners were appointed for building the bridge, and there was granted the sum of £100,000, to be raised by lottery; which, having proved unsuccessful, a new lottery was granted by a second act, in 1737. The commissioners then received plans for the proposed bridge, and among them one from Mr. Labelye, a celebrated Swiss architect and engineer, who explained by a model a method he had devised of laying the foundations of the stone piers of a bridge below the surface of the bed of the river, which design the commission approved of. The position of the bridge was next fixed at or near the Woolstaple, a little lower than New Palace Yard. Mr. [illegible] explained his plan, "that the foundation of every pier [illegible] a strong grating of timber planked underneath; that the grating [illegible] be made the bottom of a vessel, such as is called caisson to the [illegible] that the sides of this caisson should be so contrived as to be taken away after the pier should be finished; that the bed of the river should be sunk according to a sufficient depth, (none of the caissons to be laid at less than five feet below the surface of the bed of the river), and made level, in order to lay thereon the bottom of the caisson."

The commissioners next resolved that the bridge should stand upon stone piers, and fixed the number and dimensions according to Labelye's design for a stone bridge; they also appointed him engineer, but the superstructure was to be of oak wood, according to another design, and was contracted for at £99,000.

On January 20, 1739, the first stone was laid by the Earl of Pembroke; and on April 29, the first pier was finished. In the severe winter of the same year, the ice carried off and broke a great number of the piles, after which accident the commissioners dropped the design of a wooden, and resolved upon an entire stone bridge. Labelye then furnished designs from which the present bridge was built; and the work proceeded without interruption till its completion in 1746, when the last stone was laid by the Earl of Pembroke, on October 25. On November 14, 1747, the bridge, roads, and streets on both sides, were finished, the whole [illegible] nine months, and [illegible] the bridge was [illegible] piers, which occasioned it as follows:—"That the platforms upon which the piers rest, which were described by Mr. Labelye to have been placed, none less than five feet, nor more than four feet below the bed of the river, are now found to be between three and seven feet; and if London bridge be wholly removed, the consequences will most likely be fatal to Westminster Bridge." He then recommends certain works to be done for their safety, which he directed during the remainder of his life. These consisted of piling round some of the piers, and protecting them with masonry by means of a diving bell, rebuilding some of the cutwaters and octagons, &c.

Nevertheless, in 1830, Mr. Cubitt being called upon to report how far the proposed embankment for the New Houses of Parliament would affect the stability of the foundations of the bridge, he stated them to be still far from secure; he proposed to deposit heavy rubble stone round the piles—to surround each of them with short piling of oak or cast-iron, and to fill the space with stones and cement—to pave the whole space under the arches, and drive sheet piling on each side of the bridge the whole way across the river. This plan he estimated at from £130,000 to £150,000; and to completely restore the superstructure besides, in all, from £150,000 to £200,000.

In 1837, Mr. Walker inspected the bridge, and proposed for its permanent security, by coffer-dams, to pump out the water, and pile round the piers, at a cost of £70,000, also, to renew the ends and spandrils of the piers, as already begun; to take off the present parapet, and substitute a lower one; repair the masonry throughout, and improve the inclination of the road—altogether, at the cost of £105,000. In 1839, Mr. W. Cubitt, the contractor for these repairs, commenced operations by removing the accumulated mud and gravel, when the caissons were found in a perfect state, the wood (fir) even retaining its resinous smell. The details of the repairs, to the commencement of June last, will be found in No. 59 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, accompanied by two engravings of a coffer-dam, showing the precise nature of the works in progress.

The condition of the bridge relatively with the completion of the New Houses of Parliament, now became a subject of consideration. It should here be mentioned that Mr. Cubitt had already contracted for lengthening the piers, to receive arches for widening the bridge twelve feet, so as to render it the same width as London bridge. "All," say Messrs. Walker and Burges, "that we have done to Blackfriars-bridge is designed and contracted for to be done to this bridge, with the very important addition of the preparation for widening. The steepest part of Westminster-bridge roadway will [illegible] on the designs are executed, be as easy as that of Blackfriars-bridge. That which rises 1 in 14 will be reduced to 1 in 24, and even this rise will be only for a limited length." Mr Barry, in his report to H. R. H. Prince Albert, on the local improvements connected with the New Houses of Parliament, next proposed alters was corresponding with those suggested by Messrs. Walker and Burges, but with the additional proposal to take down the present semicircular arches, and substitute for them pointed arches on the same foundations; one of Mr. Barry's arguments for the change being "that the pointed arch will enable the road to be lowered, by materially reducing the thickness of the crown of the arches within what is considered necessary for arches of a circular form." Another argument is the improvement of the water-way of the bridge, besides the artistic point of view, which Mr. Barry maintains would be improved by the substitution of pointed arches, so as to harmonise with the architecture of the New Houses of Parliament. Meanwhile, Messrs. Walker and Burges consider that Mr. Barry's design would be improved by contrast, and so suggest a new superstructure of the bridge in the Norman style. The letters of both gentlemen on the subject, addressed to the Speaker of the House of Commons, will be found at length in Nos. 70 and 71 of the Civil Engineer and Architect's Journal.

On the 26th of last month there appeared in the newspapers some overcharged statements as to the safety of Westminster-bridge, which, on October 5, drew forth the following facts from Mr. Walker:—

"All the piers from the Middlesex side of the river to the centre of the bridge have been secured. Owing to the imperfection of the ground, the hollows under the piers, and the driving of the piles, some of the piers sunk during the operations of repair, one of them, the notorious "sunken pier" considerably; but since the piling round the Middlesex side has been completed, no movement has been perceptible. Two of the piers on the Surrey or east side of the centre arch, where the ground is still worse, and the current stronger, than on the Middlesex side, are also completed; and one of these, viz., the "17 feet," or Surrey pier of the centre arch, has continued to sink since the water was admitted into the coffer dam which enclosed the pier. This arch is heavier than any of the others, and had an extra load of pedestals and sheves; these have always been intended to be removed, for the purpose of lowering the parapet and roadway. [illegible] Walker and Burges) have thought it prudent, under the circumstances described, to advise their removal at once, which has, I presume, caused the paragraphs referred to, although there is no reason for any alarm as to safety. I cannot boast of the foundations of this bridge: they have long been a subject for the anxious attention of the commissioners and those employed under them. The carriage-way over the bridge was stopped for four weeks, while the works over the "sunken-pier" were in progress, and this has been the only stoppage up to the present time; but another will, probably, take place soon, for the purpose of examining the arches, and substituting for the solid masonry behind the arches brick walls of less weight, similar to what was done to the sunken pier on the Middlesex side."

INTERIOR OF THE SAVOY CHAPEL.

We do not gather precisely what other [illegible] balustrades will be removed, and a blank parapet substituted, as in Blackfriars-bridge. It may not be generally known that in Westminster-bridge, "the large, lofty balustrade, is so managed, that the swelling of each heavy balustrade exactly ranges with the eye of a foot-passenger and from a carriage, the top of the balustrade almost entirely obstructs the view of the river. Thus, one of the finest rivers in Europe is hid for the sake of preserving some imaginary proportion in architecture, relating to its form or entablature, but not applicable to its uses, a defence for safety without impeding the view. If it be urged that we should judge of it from the water, we should consider that this bridge is seen by one hundred persons from the land to one from the water. By the aid of an open upright iron fence, the most interesting view of the river might be obtained with equal safety to the spectators."—Repton, on Landscape Surveying.

[illegible] bridge is the second which has stood [illegible] across the Thames, at [illegible] two feet above, and [illegible] shorter than Waterloo bridge, [illegible] the 42 feet height [illegible] feet, it has 7 arches, the span of the centre being 76 feet. The principal portions of the bridge are stated to be so accurate, that if a person speak against the wall of any of the recesses on one side of the way, he may he distinctly heard on the opposite side: even a whisper is audible during the stillness of the night

This bridge was on Monday opened so far as regards the carriage way, by order of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, for repairs. It is expected it will remain closed at least two months. The traffic is now transferred principally to Waterloo Bridge, and the receipts from tolls at this bridge will be increased at least cent. during the repairing of Westminster bridge.

SEVRES CASKET PRESENTED BY LOUIS PHILIPPE TO QUEEN VICTORIA.

This superb souvenir of her Majesty's recent visit to the King of the French is one of the most exquisite specimens of porcelain that has been for a long time executed, at the far-famed manufactory at Sèvres. Its dimensions are about 36 inches in length, 18 inches in height, and 17 inches width. It is throughout embellished with delicate paintings by M. Devilly, representing the toilets of females in the five different divisions of the globe. Upon the cover is the figure of Europe, in the richest ball costume; upon a panel in the centre of the front is represented the toilet of a married Indian lady; upon one side are grouped the several objects for the toilet used in Senegal, and upon the opposite side are represented the modes of decorating the person in the islands of the Pacific Ocean, with the operation of tatooing in Noukahiva. And upon the back of the casket, the artist, in an extremely graceful composition, has represented a group of the women of America, native and creole, arrayed in their most beautiful costumes: this scene being, we believe, sketched from Bolivia. This is, however, but an incomplete description of this truly elegant work of art; nor will our engraving give but an imperfect idea of the exquisiteness of its decorations, which have much of the elaborate beauty of the cinque-cento style. They have been designed and executed by M. Huart, one of the most eminent Parisian artists, and they are altogether finished in admirable taste. Our engraving of this fine specimen of French art has been derived from the Parisian journal, L'Illustration.

MANCHESTER ATHENÆUM BAZAAR.

A bazaar, instituted in aid of the funds of the "Manchester Athenæum," has just been held in the large room of the Town Hall, under very distinguished patronage. The Queen Dowager and Prince Albert, and the Duke of Sutherland were amongst the patrons, besides a long list of nobility, Members of Parliament, and literary men of eminence, bankers, merchants, and manufacturers. The Athenæum at Manchester is a club provided with a large library, and was established in 1837; in 1839, Mr. Barry completed for the institution an elegant mansion, in design somewhat similar to the Reform Club House in Pall Mall; and this and other heavy expenses, coupled with a decrease of members, raised the expenditure beyond the receipts; and to meet this deficiency the above bazaar has been held.

The spacious hall, which comprises an area of 558 square yards, was most tastefully fitted up for the occasion; and instead of the stalls being placed in the centre of the room, they were ranged near the walls, leaving all the rest of the floor open for promenade. The general arrangement was a very large semi-circular stall, at the Cross-street end of the hall, for refreshments; a very elegant one of the same form at the pillars at the opposite end of the hall; two semi-circular stalls on each side of the centre compartment of the hall, and various others in the entrances to the rooms, and the recesses and corners by the pillars, making in all 17 stalls. These were fitted up with fancy draperies, each representing a sort of Moorish or Saracenic open pavilion, of crimson, blue, and amber. Each had a semi-circular canopy; and one was surmounted by a plume of feathers, and the Prince of Wales's motto, "Ich dien," and flanked by the royal standard and union-jack. The whole had a very light and pleasing effect, with the additional advantage of the light not being impeded by the articles of merchandize, &c., as is the case when the stalls occupy the middle of the floor.

The articles for sale at the stalls were not of the usual description of trifles; for there was a large collection of books and prints for sale, a miniature theatre of panoramic views, and a Bazaar Chronicle, published every morning in aid of the fund, and a Bazaar Bazaar; besides an exhibition of cartoons, and other intellectual attractions. The Queen Dowager's contribution was a beautifully worked portrait in wool of the Duke of Wellington on his charger, which was raffled for. Her Majesty also sent a number of autographs to the centre of each card having an inscription in her own handwriting, a verse of Scripture, and beneath, "A. R., 1843." There was likewise at one stall an elegant cot, in imitation of that made for the Prince of Wales, and which was to be raffled for at thirty guineas; besides many beautiful Egyptian antiquities, presented by Dr. Bowring; several pictures and drawings, wax fruit, &c.; and a portion of the dress worn by Grace Darling when she saved the lives of many fellow-creatures. A quadrille band attended, and the scene was altogether very gay. The receipts on seven days for admissions, sales, and cartoons, were £1402 12s. 1d.; besides donations and the proceeds of a soirée altogether amounting to about £1800. This result is very gratifying, although it falls far short of the amount of debt to be extinguished £3000.

RESTORATION OF THE ROYAL CHAPEL OF THE SAVOY.

Comparatively but few of the many thousands who make up the living stream that daily pours from St. Paul's to Charing-cross, are aware that in the midst of the crowds immediately west of Wellington-street, is the beautiful "Royal Chapel of the Savoy:" all that remains of the hospital of that name, upon the site of one of the finest palaces in England, erected by Peter de Savoy, about 1245, and alike the scene of courtly revel and captivity. It was burnt in 1381, by the Kentish rebels, on account of some pique they conceived against John of Gaunt, who was then its proprietor. The ground devolving to the crown, Henry VII., instead of rebuilding the palace, constructed in its place an hospital for 100 distressed objects. On the building of Waterloo-bridge, the last remains of this hospital, except the chapel, were cleared away. The chapel was originally dedicated to the Saviour, the Virgin, and John the Baptist; but, when the old church of St. Mary-le-Strand was destroyed by the Protector Somerset, the inhabitants of that parish united themselves to those of the precinct of the Savoy; and this chapel being constantly used as their church, it acquired the name of St. Mary-le-Savoy. This very interesting structure has been for some time past in a course of complete restoration and repair, by express command of her most gracious Majesty Queen Victoria.

The chapel, being built of squared stone and boulders, in the Tudor style, has an aspect of great antiquity. The exterior consists of a plain low tower; but the body has some fine large windows: it is placed in a turfed ground, and altogether presents more the appearance of a village than a metropolitan church. The interior is highly embellished: it was completely repaired and beautified in the year 1721, at the expense of his Majesty King George I. The roof is remarkably fine, being adorned with carved figures of the Holy Lamb, and emblems of the Plantagenets, down to the last of the Tudors: in a repair (?) in the reign of George III., these ornaments were whitewashed; but they have since been renovated and splendidly emblazoned, under the superintendence of Mr. Willement, who has likewise designed a new stained glass window, to be placed above the altar-screen, a very beautiful work, originally designed by Sir Reginald Bray, at the building of the chapel. This screen has also been restored by Mr. Sydney Smirke.

In addition to these and other costly improvements, her Majesty has determined to add a new organ; and Mr. Bishop has been selected by Lord Granville Somerset, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, to build the instrument. The rest of the new painted window will be defrayed by voluntary subscription among the parishioners. The chapel was endowed by Henry VII. under his will, dated 1508; and this endowment is still kept up, the incumbent receiving an annual fee by royal warrant.

The chapel will be reopened on the 29th inst., before which it is expected her Majesty will make an inspection of the alterations and improvements.

In these days of theological inquiry the Savoy has a peculiar interest, as having been the scene of the last attempt made by the state and the authorities of the church to reconcile the church and the dissenters. It cannot be forgotten that the Savoy conference finally settled the Book of Common Prayer, and that there the admirable preface to the Liturgy was written indeed, there is, we believe, an old authority to show that in this chapel the Liturgy was first publicly read. Here also, in days of yore, many of the bishops were from time to time consecrated; and among them Wilson, Bishop of Sodor and Man, by Archbishop Sharpe, in 1698.

There are many ancient monuments in this chapel worth notice: some of them are very magnificent, and of considerable historical as well as personal interest.

Quarrer,' of Lyme Regis—We must say with the mathematicians that "definitions are dangerous things;" nevertheless, we will endeavour to satisfy our correspondent. A Glee is a composition (originally of a jocial or convivial character) for three, four, or five voices, and may be sung without accompaniment. A Madrigal is a composition also for three, four, or five voices, without accompaniment; but differs widely in its character from the Glee; being, for the most part, amatory or pastoral. As to the origin of the word Madrigal, it is said by some to have been formerly in the Italian tongue to the Virgin, and certainly, if we were to judge from the numerous productions in the madrigalian style which we have imported from Italy, we should say that it was its parent land. A Quartett may be either vocal or instrumental—a composition, if of the first nature, including a dramatic character, with orchestral accompaniments; if of the second, a composition merely for four instruments, generally meaning first violin, second violin, viola, and basso

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1843.

We a short time since drew attention to the fearful contrasts presented in this vast metropolis between the extremes of life as found within its ever-widening circle. As the inclemency of the season increases, the existence of terrible masses of destitution among us is becoming more perceptible; and this week the police reports have furnished fearful details of the sufferings of penury and the pangs of want. In our northern climate the evils of utter poverty are increased tenfold. Hunger, aggravated by cold, is the rapid precursor of disease, and in such circumstances there is little interval between the beginnings of disease and that death which releases the stricken wretch; from his earthly sufferings, leaving us responsible for the neglect and indifference that have brought about the sufferings.

"Cold, selfish, sparing care and cost,
We leave the poor unaided,
But learn! for every soul thus lost,
We answer with our own

We trust, however, that the indifference is rather the result of absolute ignorance than deliberate hardness of heart. London is no longer a city, it is a whole nation of itself; more populous than many of the present monarchies of the world, far more wealthy than the most of them. But the very vastness of the sphere we move in hides one part of it from the other. Wealth and poverty co-exist, but between them there "is a deep gulf fixed." The difficulty is, to bring one extreme to a knowledge of the other. We have a police, who hunt down wretchedness, and drive it from place to place, that it may not be seen where it would offend the eye of wealth and respectability; but it cannot be extirpated; it finds a haunt somewhere, and, strange to say, it is in the immediate vicinity of the most wealthy quarters that the most terrible indications of misery are most abundant. The destitution that is driven from our streets and squares finds rest where it cannot find—in our parks, which by night, at this time of the year, are quite deserted by all who have a roof, however wretched, to cover them. The Lazzaroni of Naples can wrap themselves in their rags, and sleep under their milder southern sky, and the beggar of Venice can rest on the marble steps of the tenantless palaces of that city of the sea; but here such exposure is death, or entails sufferings compared with which death is a blessing. Yet, to these horrors numbers of our fellow creatures—the greater part of them, it is said, females—are subjected. It is useless to say that we have poor laws and poor houses. They are not equal to the demands on them, and they are moreover hedged round with so many legal forms and difficulties, that, in urgent cases, it is not uncommon for the sufferer to expire before charity, looking through the spectacles of the law, can determine whether the dole is to be given by this place or that. We trust that the publicity that has already been given to the shocking details will awake public attention, and lead to the adoption of some measures that shall prevent humanity from being thus outraged. Some refuge might be provided without any very great expense, the attention to which should be the fact of being in need of it, unfettered by legal disputes about birth places and parish settlements. Some plan of this sort must be adopted; it cannot much longer be deferred without incurring a national disgrace.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, SUNDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert attended divine service in the private chapel. The visitors at the Castle, the ladies and gentlemen of the royal suite, and the household, also attended. The Hon. and Rev. Charles Leslie Courtenay officiated. The rev. gentleman took his text from the 1st verse of the 77th Psalm. In the forenoon, the Queen and Prince Albert took their accustomed early walk; and in the afternoon her Majesty and his Royal Highness and the royal suite walked in the new plantations of the Home Park. His Serene Highness the Prince of Hohenlohe Langenburg returned to the Castle on Saturday afternoon, from Whitley Court, Worcestershire, the residence of her Majesty the Queen Dowager.

MONDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert took their usual morning promenade in the grounds around the Castle, attended by the Hohenlohe accompanying them. Sir R. Peel took leave in the forenoon for town. The Belgian Minister and Madame Van de Weyer also took their departure. The Marchese d'Harcourt, Mr. and Mrs. Harcourt, of St. Leonard's-hill, and Major General Wemyss joined the royal circle in the evening

TUESDAY.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert rode on horseback in the Park, attended by Colonel Bouverie. Her Serene Highness the Princess and Princess of Hohenlohe Langenburg walked out in the plantations and shrubberies in the precincts of the Castle. The Attorney general arrived, and had an audience of her Majesty at the Castle. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent dined with her Majesty. Mr. George Edward and the Hon. Mrs. Anson also had the honour of joining the royal circle at the Castle at dinner

WEDNESDAY.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert hunted with his harriers for the first time this season. The Prince was attended by Colonel Bouverie, and Mr. George Edward Anson. The meet was at Mr. Mason's Farm, at Upton The royal party had two good runs. His Royal Highness afterwards returned to the Castle at two o'clock. The Queen and Prince Albert went to the Ridge School in the afternoon to take equestrian exercise. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Charlotte Bunbury, and Sir George Couper, joined the royal dinner party at the Castle in the evening

THURSDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by their Serene Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Hohenlohe Langenbourg, walked out in the royal pleasure grounds. His Royal Highness Prince Albert afterwards went out shooting in the royal preserves in the Great Park. Her Majesty and the Princesses took equestrian exercise in the Ridge School Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Charlotte Dundas, and Major General Wemyss, joined the royal dinner-party.

THE DUKE OF BORDEAUX.—The Journal du Havre states, that some fifteen noble Legitimist sts, who occupied elevated situations in the household of Charles X., set out a few days since from France for London. It is said that the Duke de Bordeaux is about to form a royal household, and that he has summoned round him the principal adherents of his family. It is certain moreover, that the journey of the Prendent to England, and the activity remarked in his correspondence with his adherents, are giving serious uneasiness to the Cabinet of the Tuileries

Lieutenant-Colonel Malcolm (secretary of legation in China), after transacting business at the Foreign-office on his arrival in town on Saturday, from Hong Kong, left town for Warfield House, Berks, on a visit to his mother, Lady Malcolm, whence the gallant officer was to proceed on a visit to her Majesty at Windsor Castle. It is said the capital of China may prove an honour of knighthood, and that Mr. Davis may receive a peerage

THE LATE ROBERT STEUART, ESQ.—It is with regret we learn that intelligence has been received confirming the news of the death of Robert Steuart Esq., late member of Parliament for the Perthshire district of burghs, her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires and Consul-General at Santa Fé da Bogota. An attack of fever and ague was the cause of Mr. Steuart's death, on the 16th of July last, in his 57th year.

We are authorised to state that Mr. Henry L. Bulwer, who has been now for several years secretary to the embassy at the court of France, has been appointed to succeed Mr. Aston, as envoy-extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at Madrid

LORD LYNEDOCH.—This gallant old nobleman took his departure from Lynedoch Cottage last week, for London, where he will remain during the winter season. His lordship's age is now less than a century only by four years, and he is still in excellent health.

THE GRAND DUKE MICHAEL.—This illustrious personage, brother to the Emperor of Russia, passed through Glasgow last week, on his way to Buchanhouse the seat of the Duke of Montrose. There were two beautiful travelling carriages for his accommodation, and a number of gentlemen's carriages of the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, Lord Belhaven, and Sir Robert Liston, had been sent for the purpose of conveying the Grand Duke and his suite from Glasgow to Buchanhouse.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

COURT OF ALDERMEN.—A Court of Aldermen was held on Tuesday last, at which Mr. J. Challis was sworn in as alderman, in the room of Sir M. Wood. On the motion of Sir Peter Laurie, Mr. S. R. Goodman, who had been employed formany years in the office of the Clerk of the Peace for the city of London, was unanimously elected to the situation of Clerk to the Lord Mayor, vacant by the resignation of Mr. Hobler, who was also allowed a retiring pension of £940 per annum.

COURT OF COMMON COUNCIL.—After the adournment of the Court of Aldermen, a court was held for the despatch of business. On the motion of Mr. Jones, seconded by Sir Peter Laurie, the present Lord Mayor was elected to fill the situation of the Governor of the Irish Society, in the room of the demise of Sir Matthew Wood. Mr. Deputy Peacock gave notice of the following motion regarding Ireland:—"That this court deeply deplores the present disturbed state of Ireland, arising out of the many grievances of which that unfortunate country has cause to complain; amongst which are to be enumerated the great anomaly of a church establishment opposed to the religious wants and ardent ngs of the people: the exclusion of more than seven eighths of the community from a fair and equal share with their Protestant brethren in all places of public trust, honour, and emolument, on account of their attachment to the religion of their fathers; and the severe hardships suffered in the country by the system which the absentee landlords pursue, of intrusting the management of their estates to middlemen and jobbers. That this court earnestly recommends the adoption of conciliatory measures, with a view to the redress of the grievances of Ireland; that the people may become happy, contented, and enterprising; that, instead of concentrating their means to obtain repeal, they may be convinced of the advantage of directing their energies to uphold the legislative union between the countries, as the surest guarantee for the peace and prosperity of the empire at large." Adjourned.

DINNER TO CAPTAIN, OFFICERS, AND CREW OF THE CITY OF BOTLOOZE.—A select party of the friends of Captain Tuel met together on Tuesday last, to celebrate Captain's honourable acquittal from the charges that had been brought against him. We may here mention that the directors of the New Commercial Steam Packet Company have, as a proof of their confidence in Captain Lane, reinstated him, and the whole of his officers and crew, in their former positions

THE CUSTOM HOUSE.—As Custom House reform is the order of the day, it has been suggested that better accommodation should be afforded in the Long Room for altering and revising documents, often of inconvenient length, when parties have but a narrow ledge upon which to write. Surely the Customs authorities are bound to attend to the accommodation of the merchants from whom the revenue is derived, and need only to have those seemingly trivial but really vexatious matters pointed out, to effect a remedy, the more so really as we have heard of some of the officials on that scene at times in the most obliging humour

DEPARTURE OF THE POLICE FOR WALES.—On Tuesday another division of the metropolitan police left London for Wales, to assist the Magistracy in their present Rebeccaite duties. The men were all supplied with handcuffs, and such were the number necessary for the officers to take with them, that a large quantity of new ones were purchased for London. On Monday last not less than 50 young men, from the ages of 20 to 30, were sworn in as police constables at Scotland yard. At present the duty of what is called the crack A division, is done by other officers of the metropolitan force, those of the A force having been sent off to Wales

ST. STEPHEN'S, WALBROOK.—The Rev. Dr. Croly, the rector, has expressed his dissent from a vestry meeting held on Thursday, on the ground that a suspension of subpœnæmade is not within the spirit of the law. He reserves the parishioners of his "most sincere wish to see justice done to all parties: and next, to see the united parishes restored to Christian tranquility. Moderation and lenity are (he says) provedbly the surest means to obtain justice; but, as we may be moderate with all weakness, let us be firm without the appearance of harshness." The Rev. Incumbent, we think, is not far delay. I am for all promptitude in obtaining our rightful and our common object—the settlement of the parish accounts. I am have neither feelings nor interests separated from those of my fellow parishioners. But personal damage the best cause, and, for my part, neither man nor motive shall induce me, knowingly, to step beyond the law

THE MILITARY MOVEMENTS IN IRELAND.—It is said that the Guards, Scotch Greys, and other regiments, under orders for Ireland, have been countermanded. It is further said, that the last arrivals of "horse, foot, and artillery," in Dublin, were the result of a requisition of the Rhadamanthine hosts. In the present instance the "Great Duke" was the victim. A letter was addressed to his Grace by a person resident in Dublin, in which it was gravely set forth, that on the 15th of August a general and simultaneous rising of the Irish would take place. "On this hint he spake"—to his colleagues—and hence the increase of the Dublin garrison

ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS.—By the new charter, the title of this institution will, in future, be, "The Royal College of Surgeons in England. Instead of, as heretofore, in London: by means of which the privileges of the college will be extended to the profession in the provinces. Amongst other new provisions,

...ORGAN sets forth that there shall be two presidents and vice-presidents in rotation; the number of members not to be less than 50, nor more than 300, who shall form a new class in the college called fellows, the schedule of their names to be enrolled in the Court of Chancery. The members of council to be increased to 24. The examiners to be ten in number, in the appointment of whom surgeons or surgeons to the Queen are no longer to have the precedence. No rule ... to have effect unless sanctioned by the Secretary of State. The remainder of the charter confers the necessary privileges of the college, and declares them subject ... Parliament.

LIBERTY RENT.—Information was received on Thursday morning at Bow-street, that on the 3d instant, James Tyrrell, clerk to Robert Waters, Esq., Town-clerk of Forres, absconded from his employment, taking with him the sum of £50, belonging to his master. The young man is only nineteen years of age. A reward of £10 has been offered for his apprehension.

END OF THE BREAD-STREET SCRUTINY.—On the assembling of the Court of Wardmote at ten o'clock on Wednesday morning, Mr. Lawrence's Counsel announced that he was not their intention to prolong the struggle. He had agreed with his learned friends that they should strike off two votes from Mr. Lawrence's poll, so as to place Mr Hughes in the majority. The decisions which had taken place as to the rejection of the stamps under which the election was held, had so completely changed the number and character of the constituency, as to baffle all their calculations as to the result. It had been arranged by the counsel of the respective parties that the abrupt termination of the scrutiny was not to prejudice the right of Mr. Lawrence to move for a quo warranto, if, upon mature consideration, he should be advised to apply to the Court of Queen's Bench to revise the decision which had been given. (Hear, hear.) Proclamation was then made, and the Lord Mayor formally announced that the election had fallen upon William Hughes Hughes, Esq., the votes being for Mr. Hughes 32: for B. Lawrence, Esq., 30. A great cheering followed this announcement.

CITY OF LONDON ELECTION.—At one o'clock on Monday, Sheriffs Musgrove and Moon, attended by Secondary Jarnes, appeared upon the hustings at Guildhall, when the Queen's Proclamation was read, commanding the election of a fit and discreet person as a representative for the city of London, in the room of Sir M. Wood, deceased. The Sheriffs then appointed the hustings at Guildhall, on the Guildhall, on Friday, at twelve o'clock; and if a poll should be demanded, the voting would be on Saturday, at the various polling-booths, from eight o'clock till four. The official declaration of the result will, of course, not be made known until Monday next.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY.—The Responses, Litany, Magnificat, and Anthem of that patriarch of contrapuntists, Orlando Gibbons, were sung by the choristers of Guildhall on the service of the Abbey. The Credo, Magnificat, and Anthem in the service of Wednesday were all fine—full of the simple, grand, and impressive. The choral force by which it was supported was very full, and went with great steadiness throughout its task.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

DIABOLICAL ATTEMPT TO UPSET THE MAIL TRAIN ON THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.—On Sunday last some miscreant placed a plank across the line on the railway near Twyford, for the purpose of upsetting the mail train, but this diabolical attempt was providentially frustrated by the discovery of the plank by a policeman on duty. Wonderstand that a fellow in the employ of Mr. Cotterell, of Ruskcombe as shepherd, is in custody on the charge.

FIRES.—Shortly after four o'clock on Monday morning a fire broke out at Bernander and Hemsley, on the premises of Messrs. Brown, Brewer and Co., patent block-makers. In a short time the Rotherhithe London Establishment had engine was brought to bear on the flames, followed by twelve others, which notwithstanding the formidable force and the torrents of water thrown on the destructive element, it reached the extensive premises of Messrs. Bonner, rope and rag merchants. The damage done, however, we are happy to state, was not great, considering the nature of the locality in which it originated. About eight o'clock in the morning a fire broke out upon the premises occupied by Mr. J. King, printer, &c., College-hill, Queen-street, Cheapside. A lad in the employ of Messrs. Morgridge and Sprague, wholesale stationers, was proceeding to his work when he saw volumes of smoke issuing from the basement story. The engines from Watling-street being unfortunately rendered useless by the passage of a fluid, a plentiful supply of water being obtained, the fire was speedily extinguished.

SINGULAR DEATH.—An infant child, the son of parents named Allwood, residing at Birmingham, came by his death last week in consequence of a needle having entered near the sixth rib and penetrated the pericardium, whilst being nursed by his grandmother, who is a laborer by trade. There were two ounces of coagulated blood in the pericardium, the point of the needle had penetrated the muscular substance of the right ventricle of the heart about the size of a sixpence, perforating to the depth of half a line. In all other respects the body was healthy.

HORRIBLE DEATH.—On Sunday last, a child girl named Hannah White, aged 13 years, an inmate of the Limehouse workhouse, was burned to death in consequence of her clothes catching fire. The poor girl was left for a few moments by the nurse in charge of another child, and the catastrophe occurred during that brief temporary absence. A coroner's jury have returned a verdict of "Accidental death," but it is said the Poor-law Commissioner intends making it the subject of a rigid inquiry.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE DOVER RAILWAY.—An accident occurred on Tuesday night on the Dover Railway, whereby the driver of the train which left the London terminus at a quarter-past ten o'clock has unfortunately lost his life. It seems that the poor fellow, in leaning over the engine carriage, overbalanced himself and fell under the wheels. One leg was torn off at the upper part of the thigh, and the other above the ankle. He was taken out quite dead, and immediately removed on a stretcher to Guy's Hospital, where he shortly afterwards expired.

SERIOUS RENCONTRE.—On Monday morning, between two and three o'clock, constable Carney, 104 H, and constable Cunningham, 57, whose beats in the Commercial-road East join, met, and a quarrel ensuing, they got to fighting. Cunningham, not being on duty; but Cunningham, it appeared, not being satisfied, followed his adversary, and, as it is alleged by a woman who witnessed the occurrence, commenced an attack upon him, and struck him a severe blow, by which Carney got his left leg broken, about midway between the knee and ankle, and was obliged to be removed on a stretcher to the London Hospital, where he still remains in a very bad state. Cunningham has since been ordered to attend the Commissioners.

SACRILEGIOUS ROBBERIES.—On Tuesday information was received that, on the night of the 11th instant, the parish church of Penshurst, near Maidstone, was broken into and robbed of a number of surplices and gowns belonging to the clergymen and clerk, a quantity of black cloth, used for covering the pulpit, a quantity of wax candles, upwards of a dozen bottles of wine, and various other things. The vestry-room of Wellesbourne church, Sussex, has also been broken into, and the communion plate, consisting of a flagon, a chalice, and two patens, stolen from an iron chest.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERIES.—On the same day, the following informations were received:—On Saturday night last the dwelling house of William Nelld, at Christleton-bridge, was entered and robbed of £70 in gold and silver, and other property. Early on Saturday morning the house of Mrs Letitia Widders, at High Leigh, county of Chester, was broken into by four men and robbed of £50 in gold and in silver (chiefly shillings), and a small old-fashioned silver watch, with silver gilt case-double dial-hands. One of the robbers is described as a broad set man, of short stature, about 33 years of age, with broad flat nose, who wore a blue pilot coat and cap. The other three were described as 25 or 27 years of age, with fresh complexion, and all were blue pilot coats. A reward for their apprehension has been offered by the High Leigh Association, and a further reward by Mr. Widders. A few nights since the cottage of a keeper on Ansley and Peasley Hall, near Nuneaton, was broken into and robbed of a canvass bag, containing eight sovereigns, a £5 note, and a banker's receipt for a sum of money, signed by "Robert Skipper," of Messrs Gurney's bank.

ARTFUL SWINDLING.—An exceedingly clever fellow has been trying his hand in this line very recently amongst the dissenting portion of the community at Cambridge, representing himself to be from the Bible Institution, and to have been in the service of the Duke of Wellington. By his handsome person, winning manners, and very religious deportment, he succeeded in getting introduced to several of the families of the town, and wherever he called he was sure to get a donation. At last he got himself baptised at Eden Chapel, one of their places of worship. Peculiarities began to contend, at length, for the honour of entertaining Arthur, or Arthur as he is now called, and a small old-fashioned silver watch, with silver gilt case-double dial-hands, found to be the man.

FIRE IN THE KENT ROAD.—On Tuesday night, as nine o'clock, a fire broke out in the Crown House, Old Kent-road, belonging to Mr. Barnard, silk mercer and linen-draper. The fire originated in the shop amongst a quantity of light goods ... in the window, through the sudden draft of the flames to make much destruction. ... which, getting round the premises, soon caused the flames to make much destruction. Fortunately the fire was soon arrested in its progress, and although the South ... engine was quickly on the spot, ... ready quick in arriving, their services were not ... the flames. Having been extinguished in the interim.

A DESPERATE LEAP FROM A RAILWAY TRAIN.—A few days since, as a Twyford constable was conveying a prisoner (who had been sentenced to three months' imprisonment) from that place to Abingdon gaol, by the Great Western railway, the prisoner, shortly after leaving the Maidenhead train was proceeding at the rate of upwards of thirty miles an hour, suddenly leaped from the carriage tumbling over head and heels into the road. The constable, upon the impulse of the moment, and without considering upon the danger he would encounter, immediately jumped out after him. Those in the train, who witnessed the foolhardy conduct of the two men, imagined that both must have been mortally killed. Extraordinary as it may appear, neither were in the least injured, and the prisoner was again captured by the courageous constable, who walked along the line to the next station with his prisoner, and proceeded from thence to his place of destination, where they arrived at a somewhat early hour in the morning. Upon reaching, ... goodes, the constable and the prisoner had something to eat together, when the constable left the room for a few seconds, the prisoner assuring him that upon his return "he would find him as right as the knocker at Newgate." However, during the absence of the "trustful Dogberry," the knave quietly jumped out of the window, unknown to any one about the house, and got, for the time, clear off. He was afterwards captured, and safely housed in Abingdon gaol, whence it is not likely he will give the slip until the expiration of his sentence.

FIRE AT ISLINGTON.—On Wednesday night, about eight o'clock, a fire broke out in the private dwelling-house in the occupancy of Mr. W. C. Richards, 4, Sherperton place, New North-road, Islington. The flames, when first discovered, were raging with fearful rapidity in the second-floor, threatening to destroy the entire building. Fortunately, a plentiful supply of water was quickly procured, and owing to the exertions of the inmates the conflagration was arrested in its ... and in a short time the same was entirely extinguished, but not before ... done to the furniture and the inside

DARING BURGLARY AT KENSINGTON.—On Wednesday morning the family of Captain R. Black, residing at No. 5, St. George's-terrace, Gloucester-road, Kensington New Town, were thrown into a state of much consternation by discovering that the premises had, during the night, been burglariously entered and robbed. The thieves, it appeared, had, by scaling two high walls at the rear of the house, got into the back garden, and by means of boring several holes with a centre-bit, effected an entrance into the house. They then ransacked the front parlour, and also the front drawing room, but ventured no higher up stairs, and took their departure the same way they entered, without disturbing the family, and carrying off with them a large silver snuffbox, three silver tea and dessert spoons a small plated waiter with silver edges, and other articles. The thieves left behind them the centre bit and a screw-driver, from the appearance of which it is evident they were not experienced burglars.

BURGLARIES IN THE CITY.—The crime of burglary, we regret to see, is daily increasing in the metropolis and suburbs, notwithstanding the lynx-eyed guardianship of the City police force, whose zeal and efficiency in other particulars before the public eye. It is a very astounding fact that the detection of these offences fall very far short of the number committed: whilst, as will be seen by a reference to the police intelligence, the villains who commit and perpetrate these daring robberies become daily more emboldened by success, and perpetrate their hazardous enterprises in the most public thoroughfares, in many cases without the least chance. As an instance of the extent to which the feeling of security carries these midnight depredators, we have to mention that, on Wednesday night last, the counting-house of Messrs. Palmer and Clayton, printers, Crane-court, was broken open, and search made for the notes and gold which the delinquents being discovered. Fortunately, on the present occasion, the cash and valuable securities had been previously removed, so that the robbers were disappointed in their booty. A similar attempt was made on Messrs. Perry and Co.'s establishment, next door, was broken open, and cash, cheques, and bills to a large amount carried away; and a similar visitation was made to the office of the Nonconformist newspaper opposite. The general opinion is that these robberies were committed by the same parties; and what makes the matter more strange is, that the court has only one outlet, and that into the crowded thoroughfare of Fleet-street.

AWFUL VISITATION.—A family residing at Rendern, stonemason, his wife, and six children, at Rendern, was struck by electric fluid on the night of Thursday last, and the effects were most melancholy. All the family had gone to bed, save the wife, about one o'clock, when a most awful thunder-clap broke, next door, was broken open, and cash, cheques, and bills to a large amount carried away; and a similar visitation was made to the office of the Nonconformist newspaper opposite. The general opinion is that these robberies were committed by the same parties; and what makes the matter more strange is, that the court has only one outlet, and that into the crowded thoroughfare of Fleet-street.

DETERMINED SUICIDE OF A YOUNG LADY.—On Tuesday evening a youngLady, named Christian Graham, 22 years of age, committed suicide by cutting her throat at her residence, 94, Beresford-street, Walworth-road. The deceased was living with two sisters and two nephews. Her mother had recently died and her father was abroad. The loss of one parent and the absence of the other, together with a reduced station in life, are supposed to have led to the commission of the melancholy act.

SERIOUS ACCIDENT TO LORD SHERBORNE.—We regret to hear that a serious accident occurred to Lord Sherborne on Saturday morning last. His Lordship was riding over Ascot Heath with the harriers of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, by his horse failing in crossing a ditch which divides the course from the road, and throwing its rider with considerable force against the ground. Mr. Davis (her Majesty's huntsman), and others proceeding to his assistance, it was found that Mr. Ballard had dislocated his shoulder and sustained some bruises on the head. He was conveyed to Mr. Hinde's, at the Royal Stand, where Mr. Browne, surgeon, of Ascot, set the bone, and Mr. Ballard was taken to his residence, at Sleigh, in the course of the day. The harriers, on Saturday, had a very short run. A hare was found at the back of the royal stand, and killed in view. Mr. Ferrand's farm, hard by, and was there killed in less than ten minutes after the find.

THE FIRE PROOF DRESS.—Between the hours of eight and nine on Tuesday morning, just as Mr. Braidwood had returned to the chief station of the brigade force in Watling-street, from the extensive fire in Bermondsey, information was received of another fire having broken out in Colleton-row, Lambeth-road. Two of the engines were immediately dispatched to the spot, and on their arrival the firemen found it raging on the premises of Mr. John King, printer and engraver. They were instantly got to work, but it was some time before the precise seat of the fire could be traced out, as smoke in great quantities was issuing from different parts of the building. Some of the brigademen proceeded into the premises with wet clothes over their faces, in order to discover the origin of such a dense and suffocating character that they were obliged to make a quick retreat. During this time the greatest alarm prevailed amongst the inhabitants, and it was at length resolved to report to the foreproof dress worn by Captain Paulin, of the Fire Preventive Service in Paris, to the London Brigade Force. The engineer of the chief station (Dowding) having equipped himself in the dress, the iron grating of the cellars was torn up, and the fire proceeded and discovered the body of the fire. Having a branch belonging to one of the engines in his hand, he directed the water on to the burning mass, and in the course of a quarter of an hour succeeded in subduing the fire. It was then ascertained that it had been confined to a large quantity of waste paper and rubbish in the cellars. The dress above alluded to has, we are happy to state, been the means of preserving several extensive conflagrations. It is made of leather, in the shape of a shirt, with a covering for the head, and is similar to a diving dress, the air being supplied to the wearer by one of the fire-engines.

SCANDALOUS ROTTENNESS.—On Wednesday afternoon the proprietor of Neighbour's Tavern and Coffee House Cannon street, City, discovered that the whole of the story of "Ten Til ousand a-Year" had been cut out from one separately bound volumes of "Blackwood's Magazine." Robberies and mutilations of this description have of late become very common in coffee houses.

POSTSCRIPT.

OXFORD, Oct. 19.—A special congregation was held this day, when the following degrees were conferred:—Doctor in Divinity: The Rev. James Norris, President of Corpus Christi College, grand compounder. Master of Arts: The Rev. Samuel Clarke, of St. John's College. The Regius Professor of Medicine will commence his course on Anatomy and Surgery, on Wednesday, the 25th inst., at two o'clock. The Regius Professor of Modern History proposes to read with a class, "Memoires de Philip, de de Commes," on Tuesday and Thursday, the 26th inst., at two o'clock: to commence Tuesday, the 31st inst. The Reader in Experimental Philosophy will commence a course of lectures on Mechanics, on Wednesday, the 8th inst., at one o'clock. There were twenty one matriculations.

CAPTAIN HOSE.—The gallant captain, whose portrait forms the smaller portion of our paper, was married on Wednesday last, at Wadworth, by the Rev. J. Sharpe, D.D., to Ann, eldest daughter of Thomas Coulman, Esq., of Wadworth Hall, Yorkshire. The bride was given away by her uncle, R. J. Coulman, Esq., of Wadworth Hall; and Captain Ross was attended by his friends and relations, some of several of the arctic and antarctic voyagers—Captains Crozier and Back, and by Captain M. C. Dixon, R.N.

COURT OF LORD MANAGE.—His Grace the Duke of Wellington, in his capacity of Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, held a Court of Lord Shepway, or Court, at Deal, on Tuesday, for the superannuation of of the Cinque Port Pilots, and the making of new ones to fill up vacancies. The first business was the choosing of a master of the pilots, by the votes of the fellowship. The choice fell on Mr. Daniel Pendy, by a large majority. Mr Henry Barber was chosen warden for Dover, and Mr. Meekie for Deal. The vacancies filled up were about twenty, as mentioned above, and there were upwards of fifty candidates present at the ceremony. The ceremony of making the pilots commenced about eleven o'clock, and lasted till four o'clock in the afternoon, when his Grace took his departure for Walmer Castle, instead of waiting to go over and dine at the ex-pensive Court days, he having to meet a party of friends at his private residence. The last similar Court held was in November, 1...

Captain Sir Henry Blackwood, Bart., ... her Majesty's ship Fox, and Captain ... ship Iris. Both the ... service.

THE FREE CHURCH ASSEMBLY.—On Tuesday last the second General Assembly of the Free Protesting Church of Scotland met in Glasgow. He proceeded to preach an impressive sermon, taking as a text from Nehemiah vi. 11. At the close of the discourse, Dr. Chalmers intimated that, after the benediction had been pronounced, the Assembly would be convened and constituted, which was accordingly done by solemn prayer. The roll of the Assembly was then called over, and and a number of new commissions were given in. Dr. Chalmers then proposed as new Moderator, Dr. Thomas Brown. This was agreed to. Dr. Brown was then conducted from the committee-room to the chair. On his re-appearance on the platform, the whole of the members rose and received him standing, and the audience expressed their satisfaction by cheers. The Moderator then addressed the Assembly. Dr. M'Farlan moved the thanks of the Assembly to Dr. Chalmers for the eminent services ... to the Free Church as their Moderator. The motion was then carried by acclamation. Dr Chalmers returned thanks. After some further business the Assembly adjourned.

We have heard on good authority that the Bath money (or prize money) ... ing from the ransom of Canton will be paid in the course of the ensuing month, orders having been already issued to the Treasury to make the necessary arrangements for its distribution. This gratuity has already been paid to the forces in India, who were employed in the expedition.

POLICE.—Guildhall, (FRIDAY.) THE HORRORS OF INTEMPERANCE ILLUSTRATED.—High Bail, a private, lately belonging to the Royal Artillery, was charged before Alderman Gibbs with attempting to drown himself, by jumping into the river Thames from London Bridge on Wednesday last. He was in liquor at the time, and was saved by a Thames police boat, which came by at the moment, and no time was lost in conveying him to St. Thomas's Hospital. Alderman Gibbs asked him what could have induced him to attempt the rash act. The prisoner said it was all through drunk. He was in the Royal Artillery for several years, and was frequently flogged for getting drunk. On the 15th of this month he was discharged, being declared unfit for the service by the medical board. He then came up to London with the intention of going to Ireland, but has spent all his money in drink, and having no means of subsistence, he determined to destroy himself.—Alderman Gibbs ordered the prisoner to be remanded for a week, and desired that the Governor of the Compter should write to the military and ...ities at Woolwich respecting the prisoner in the mean time.

EXTENSIVE EMBEZZLEMENT BY A SOLICITOR'S CLERK.—A youth, named Backham, was charged with embezzling sums of money to a large amount, the property of his employer, Mr. Harrison, solicitor, of Walbrook. The prisoner absconded on the 8th of August last, and was "never heard of" in Calais the latter at Camberwell, yesterday (Friday) morning. The only case entered into was that of receiving the sum of £10 15s. 3d. from Mr. Potter, of Bishopsgate-street The prisoner was remanded for a week, as Mr. Robinson was making a great number of note

FIGHTING IN THE GUILDHALL.—THE ELECTION.—A young man named Johnson, who described himself as an elector, was fined 10s. for fighting in the Guildhall, during the nomination of the candidates, and strange one of the city police in the execution of his duty

EXTRAORDINARY CASE.—CHILDBIRTH OR EPILEPSY?—On Wednesday an inquest, which had been ... ges adjourned, was held at the Lord Bloomfield public house, near Woolwich before Mr. C. Carter, on view of the body of Mrs. Mary Prevost, aged 17 (wife of a labouring man, residing at No. 10, St. Mary's-terrace, Charlton-street), whose death was alleged to have been caused by the ill-treatment of her husband and children. A number of witnesses were examined, the details of whose evidence disclosed a case the wretched and filthy state in which the poor woman was found and starved, was truly horrifying. Prevost, the husband, who was attended by counsel, made a statement denying the allegations. The room was then cleared, and, after half an hour's deliberation, the coroner announced that the jury had come to a verdict that the deceased had died from natural causes; but at the same time expressed their opinion that the conduct of Mr. Prevost and his daughters had been disgraceful and criminal in the extreme, and had the medical evidence been a little more positive, in all probability he and some of his family would have been sent from that place to prison. The whole of the blame attached to him, in fact and it was painful to reflect that he had made his daughters subject to a public censure. As it was, they would leave the room without any one feeling compassion for them. He fully concurred in the verdict and sentiments the jury had desired him to express.

SHOCKING OCCURRENCE.—TWO LIVES LOST.—On Tuesday, between the hours of twelve and one o'clock, the following distressing occurrence took place on the river, near Battersea by which two respectable men, named George Jack son, aged about 30, and William Stevens, aged 29, residing in Pimlico road, Chelsea, met with their death.—About the time above mentioned the two unfortunate deceased men, accompanied by another person, named George Jones, residing in the Vauxhall-road, were proceeding down the river in a funny, in which they had been rowing, and had reached as far as Battersea, in safety, when they unfortunately got athwart a barge; one of the party (Stevens) stood up to push the boat off, but, overbalancing himself, he fell into the river, the boat instantly fill ing with water, and sinking. The cries of the unfortunate men were truly heartrending, as I, before any assistance could be rendered to them, too place being very lonely spot. Stevens and Jackson, after struggling some seconds for life sank to rise no more. Jones, being a very good swimmer, endeavored to keep up until he was picked up by a man name Dear, who was rowing down the river. This melancholy event caused quite a sensation in the neighbourhood of the accident. The bodies were not found.

ANOTHER FATAL ACCIDENT AT THE NEW CROSS STATION.—While the coroner's jury were employed in inquiring into the cause of death of the engineer of the Bricklayers' Arms branch of the South-Eastern line, a fresh piece of horror came the mutilated body of another poor fellow was brought to the hospital; and the following particulars relative to the accident were handed to the reporter by Mr. Charles Gregory, resident engineer of the New Cross line at the Great Dane, who was present in the inquest room. It appears that the deceased, Edward Postans, was a coach-trimmer, and, being engaged upon the railway about a quarter past two o'clock on Thursday, was at the time Mr. Gregory was in the act of leaving the station, he attempted to cross the line, when the "bankers" engine, which always follows the above train, to assist it up the New Cross inclined plane, struck him down, and in a feels yeare I over his person. The injuries he sustained were of the most frightful character. Both legs were separated from the trunk below the knees, with the exception of a few sinews, and one arm was cut off. Although the unfortunate man was conveyed with the greatest despatch to the hospital, the surgeon was, that it was quite impossible that he could recover, and, on inquiry as a late hour, he was stated to be dead. In the former case, the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death."

MELANCHOLY SHIPWRECK AND LOSS OF LIFE.—A correspondent informs us of the shipwreck of the Mary Anne, of Arbroath, about six miles from Islay, on the coast of Argyleshire, on the night of the 10th inst., with the loss of all hands on board, except one man, named John Purvis. She sailed last from Newcastle, for Stranraer Lough, on Tuesday last, with a cargo of 400 tons of coal. Besides the captain, the crew consisted of two David Campbell, a native of Arbroath, and five sailors one of them a boy. The Mary Anne was loaded of the Rais of Islay.

THE PANORAMA.—Information was given, with a description of a person who on Monday last hired a first-floor front room in Mr. Mesmer's house at the Strand. He is about forty, five years of age in appearance, five feet six inches high, dark complexion, with dark whiskers; dressed in dark clothes, and wore a dark mixture Tweed. He represented himself to be a commercial traveller, and carries a small carpet bag and umbrella

MORLEY.—A most alarming fire broke out on the premises belonging to Mr. Gleasings, a pastry cook, carrying on business at No. 2, East Sollolk street, Borough. The flames were soon extinguished, but not until a considerable deal of damage was done.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT WALTON, SURREY.—On Wednesday afternoon a most destructive fire broke out on the farm of Mr. Cooper, situated near the village of Walton, in Surrey. The flames were discovered, were burst forth from a quantity of straw lying against one of the premises, and ... raged were their progress, that the barn, which was filled with thrashed ... Mr. Cooper's stock, and on fire almost before an alarm could be raised. FOREIGN.

SPAIN.—Letters and journals from Madrid of the 10th inst. have arrived. They contain the details of the ceremony of laying the first stone of the Palace of the Cortes, as well as the dinner of the 8th, and the fete held on the occasion of the Queen's birthday. The spectacle was unmarked by the slightest attempt at disturbance. The more recent news from Castile, Galicia, the Asturias, Valencia, Murcia, and Estramadura, described these provinces as being perfectly tranquil Catalonia appears to be the only province which presents an exception to the general tranquillity.

DEER-STALKING.

Lo! along the mist-pla[illegible]

And sportive in its fear.

To the noble sport of the forest no longer is always some incentive to pleasure; if it were otherwise, there would be no "heart-throbbings of delight" to the young huntsman, who,

The Indian jungle tries
For the larger game that lies:
Or the Lybian forest dares,
To beard its inmates in their l[illegible]

But sometimes it happens that the spoils of dangerous chase are not to be obtained with the risks run in encountering for them. Not so with deer-stalking; there may be, certainly, some slight perils attached to it, but these only serve to produce more excitement; and perhaps there is a greater trial of skill between the intellectually circumventing powers of the huntsman, and the physical sagacity to avoid, on the part of the hunted, which "quickens the appetite" for possession, and when possessed, makes it "more fiercely to enjoy."

But all this time we are talking, or speaking, or writing about the noblest sport that can take place in

Taro' fore[illegible]'s op, of lofty pin
In which the valleys share not—
For if each dead they c[illegible] design
Their prudence whispers—Don not:

No! the real home of the hunter is the mountain and its heather "the lofty peak, with its fretted crystalline flanks—the everhanging precipice, with its caverns, its rills, and its foliage—the sudden rush of the reconcealed cataract—the ghastly pine, dead and naked, yet in the form and attitude of life—the brown moss, displaying the wreck of ancient forests, and furnishing a unit of measure to sound the depths of primeval time: the mountain lake, now blue with the azure which it embosoms, now green with the purity of its waters, now bright with the ruffled reflection of the clouds, now in ebullition with the thunder-shower—these are the objects which meet the hunter's eye, and from which the geologist, the moralist, and the painter (we will add poet), may draw the richest instruction.

But again, where is the real home of the hunter who inhabits such a poetically-described region? In the Highlands of Scotland! Some of the most distinguished locales we will enumerate.

The Forest of Atholl, in Perthshire, which is about 40 miles long, and 18 broad, containing nearly 140,000 acres, whereof 3,742 are occupied by grouse, and 51,700 by deer!

The Forest of Marr, in Aberdeenshire, consisting of four contiguous glens on the north bank of the Dee, about 15 miles long, and 8 wide, covering an area of 60,000 acres.

The Forest of Corrichibah, or the Black Mountain, in Argyllshire, containing 30,000 acres.

The Forest of Invercauld—22,000 acres. The Marquis of Huntley's Forest, upwards of 30,000 acres; the Duke of Richmond's 30,000 acres, and several others of various inferior but approaching extents.

A late most intelligent and poetically-imbued chronicler of "The Art of Deer-Stalking" (Wm. Scrope, Esq.), has given some of the most graphic descriptions of this sport which painter, poet, and a philosopher could possibly congregate in the space of an octavo volume. We have not space to record all the marvels that have taken place in the course of that most worthy gentleman's experience, but we cannot forego the exertion of making room for his following sine qua non qualifications of a deer-stalker:—"His muscle must be marble, and his sinews of steel. He must run like the antelope, and breathe like the trade-winds" (rather Jonathan this); "he must be also able to run in a stooping position with a greyhound pace, having his back parallel to the ground, and his face within an inch of it for miles together." He should rejoice in wading through torrents and be able to stand firmly on water-worn stones, unconscious of the action of the current; or if by fickle fortune the waves should be too powerful for him, when he loses his balance, and goes floating away upon his back (for if he has any tact, or sense of the picturesque, it is presumed he will fall backwards), he should raise his rifle aloft in the air, Marmion fashion, lest his powder should get wet, and his day's sport (?) come suddenly to an end." * * * * "To swim he should not be able, because there would be no merit in saving himself by such a paltry subterfuge; neither should he permit himself to be drowned, because we have an affection for him, and, moreover, it is very cowardly to die!" Is this an imitation of the Waltonian style?—if so—it is one with a "longum intervallum" between the original and the copy.

THE FIRST FIRE OF THE SEASON.

THE FIRST FIRE OF THE SEASON.

The lighting of the first fire for the season is one of the annual events of the domestic circle, the evenings shorten in and a sort of general chilliness becomes very perceptible; but there is a wish to produce the very appearance of summer as long as possible, so there is a delay in ordering in the coals, but delay in all nothing: the sky becomes more and more November-ish, and though it is only October by the almanac, yet it is voted winter by general consent, or rather general feeling, and the scene our artist has sketched is the result, we hope multiplied through thousands of happy households. The "old folks" tell us that they remember when the good people of the city never made themselves comfortable till "Lord Mayor's day"—that great civic event—however cold the weather might be before the 9th of November. How they must have envied the cooks of the Guildhall Banquet, though in all the pride of self-denial they were above the weakness of confessing it! Perhaps Winter was tardier in his arrival in those days, and only sent a wholesome kind of "fine bracing air" till a day or two before the important 9th, when he would commission a smart frost to harden the roads for the procession, keep the shoes of the city footmen clean, and sharpen the noses and appetites of all parties present. Then it was considered winter, and it was orthodox to handle the poker and coal-skuttle. We are a more impatient generation, and do not choose to let our teeth chatter in our heads till his Lordship has paid his morning call to the Judges at Westminster. Every age has its prejudices, but we cannot help thinking our plan is the most rational to light up the hearth when it is required, without regard whether it is "a day before or a day after" any event at all. So put on some more coals! We have heard frequent repetitions of the lines in Hamlet this week, though the dialogues were in decided prose; the sentiment, however was the same—

The air bites shrewdly, it is very cold,
It is a nipping and an eager air.

There' now we been in look comfortable, and to feel so also, and having broken a solid lump of the "heat-diffusing substance," as Homer would have called it if he had ever sung of coals, for the mere sake of seeing the flame, we find ourselves warmly disposed to poetry, which thus breaks forth into A SONG FOR THE SEASON.

THE FIRST FIRESIDE.

The Spring may boast its vernal bow'rs,
Its closing shades and opening flow'rs
Its songs of birds from morning hours
To eventide!
Give me the homely joys we greet
When, fill'd each hospitable seat,
Some kindred spirits kindly meet
'Round First FIRESIDE!

Let Summer shed her burning glow
To melt the chilly mountain snow
And make the valley-streamlets flow
In gushing pride—
She hath not such a charm to make
The drooping heart so sweetly take
A part in mirth for mirth's own sake
As warm FIRESIDE!

Rich Autumn with her golden store,
May count her treasures o'er and o'er,
And say such wealth did ne'er before
The land decide—
But in a snug and sheltered room,
Where neither mind's nor season's gloom
Can blight our joyous—mental bloom—
Give me—FIRESIDE!

Now fruits and flowers, and yellow sheaves
Are gather'd in, and wither'd leaves
Be all the traveller's eye perceives
In prospect wide—
How sweet to ramble through some book,
Or chat with social friends in nook
From which we have the cheering look
Of good FIRESIDE.

And then to send the glass around,
And have the happy meeting crown'd,
With some old ditty's cordial sound,
Too oft denied—
To melodies of greater skill,
That have no power, if they've the will
To touch our hearts like those that thrill
'Round old FIRESIDE.

Then hail the genial season, hail!
O'er mild October's nut-brown ale,
Let's sit and hear the merry tale,
Or aught beside—
Which may the passing hour engage
Of life we'll on the varied page,
And hope for happy good old age
By our FIRESIDE.

W.

THOMAS BARING, ESQ.

The opponent of Mr. Pattison bears a name well and widely known in the circles of trade and commerce; the family of the Barings has been remarkable for generations, and furnishes a parallel to those races of great Italian merchants, who continued to carry on their commercial transactions for age after age, though possessed of the wealth of princes, frequently becoming ennobled, and sometimes, as in the case of the Medici of Florence, attaining the rank of sovereign princes themselves. In England, great as is the respect we pretend to pay to commerce, the attainment of wealth is frequently accompanied by the desire to sever all connection with the means by which it was acquired. The fortune amassed by the successful merchant is spent by the children he has educated in continual contact with the classes by whom commerce and all its operations are habitually despised. Our merchants are not princes; that is to say, but few of them are proud of their commerce in itself, for what it really is—the civilizing power of the world. The Italian traders of the middle ages had a commercial pride, as strong as that of the churchman or the noble; the German and Dutch merchants of the present day exhibit something of a kindred feeling. The avocation of the merchant is with them hereditary. And this has been the case with the Baring family, whose origin is, in fact, German, though they have long been naturalized and settled in England, have often given legislators to the lower house, and recently one, ennobled by a coronet, to the House of Peers.

Mr. THOMAS BARING is the son of Sir Thomas Baring, of Larkbeare, Devon, is the nephew of the present Lord Ashburton, and the brother of the Whig Chancellor of the Exchequer, the brothers being of adverse politics, but each having a talent for financial and commercial matters. The same discrepancy of political opinion, curiously enough, marks another well-known commercial family, the Labouchieres. Mr. Baring has the advantage of his opponent in point of years, for he is in the vigour of his age. Like his opponent he has been in Parliament for a short time, but his political career has been rather disturbed by difficulties, such as petitions, election committees, and compromises. He was elected for Yarmouth in 1835, and sat till 1837; in the election of that year he was again returned, but a petition was presented against his election. A compromise took place by which his opponent, Mr. Wilshire, vacated the seat, but in the contest that followed Mr. Baring lost his election by a majority of 30 votes. While he sat in Parliament he was a supporter of the Conservative party, and of the policy of Sir R. Peel, to which he still adheres. His recent speeches have sufficiently shown this; he is one of the moderate section of the party; will improve but will not change needlessly; nor will he retrograde to the advocacy of the monastic institutions, and the feasts and holidays patronised by "Young England," under the idea that they are broaching a political system. It was said of Lord Ashburton, that, when in the House of Commons, he always gave his speech one way and his vote another. It is not likely that Mr. Baring will be quite so extreme in his want of decision; but there is a tinge of the fault to be perceived in his addresses. He is not quite confident enough of the operation of his own principles, and seems to admit, by implication, that "a good deal may be said on both sides." He has, from his family connections, great influence in the City: they have been, and still are, engaged in some of the greatest commercial speculations of the day. One of the latest has excited considerable interest: the contract to form the communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, across the Isthmus of Panama. One of the conditions of the contract is the cession to the Barings of a grant of land, containing 5,000 acres! Lord Ashburton already possesses an immense number of acres on the American and Canadian frontiers. Lord Byron has immortalized

Jew Rothschild and his fellow-christian—Baring.

(One of the former famous name, by-the-by, is also actively engaged as a partisan in this contest.) But his description of the results of extensive commerce is even more applicable to the Barings than to his ideal of a miser:—

> The lands on either side are theirs: the ship
> From Ceylon, Inde, or far Cathay, unlands,
> For them, the fragrant produce of each trip;
> Beneath their cars of Ceres groan the sands;
> And in their hamlets like Aurora's sip
> Their very rustics might be kings in shades.

Those who conduct such operations, as "lords of all," may well obtain an influence over those around them. The only question is, whether the principles involved in the struggle are not such as to weigh down personal influence. Were the contest carried on upon personal qualities only, we think, in such a commercial city as London, a member of this great mercantile house would not have much reason to doubt as to the result of it.

PORTRAIT OF MR. BARING.

JAMES PATTISON, ESQ.

Our present number goes forth to the public in the midst of all the excitement and bustle of a contested election for the City of London, a seat for which is the highest honour a citizen can obtain at the hands of his countrymen, involving as it does the possession of the admiration and confidence of an immense constituency, in the commercial centre of the empire. No wonder it has been so often and so keenly contested, and that the scenes to which those contests have given rise have sometimes been of a rather violent character. Without subscribing entirely to the maxim that "party is the madness of many, for the gain of the few," it is certain that the details of an election in the olden time present a picture rather difficult to reconcile with a state of perfect sanity. The great changes that have taken place in our representative system have, however, worked at least this improvement—that the machinery of elections—if it may so be called—is much less capable of being misused. In the first place, the struggle is shortened in duration, the legislature being of opinion with Macbeth, that

> If, when 'tis done, 'twere well done—then 'twere well
> It were done quickly

One day now begins the choice and brings the decision; the ruinous expense to the candidates of a contest of many days was but a small part of the evil. The struggle that might have been begun in good humour, was soon converted, by its duration, into a bitter conflict of persons rather than principles, often proceeding to absolute violence. The youthful generation can hardly imagine the scenes that have occurred in the "good old times" during the elections for London and Westminster. A pelting in Covent Garden was one of the regular things a candidate had to undergo, and the path to St. Stephen's—never perhaps strewed with roses—was then thickly sown with cabbage stalks; an election was, in fact, a sort of saturnalia, in which the mob had a full licence to indulge their passions to any extent short of committing homicide—and occasionally it went even to that. There was, perhaps, more scope given to individual humour, there was a greater departure from the routine of every-day life, but these doubtful advantages, serving rather to furnish matter for the novel or the caricature, were poorly purchased by the sacrifice of peace, good order, and that calmness requisite for the due exercise of judgment, which is more necessary in choosing a representative than in anything else.

One of the gentlemen appealing to-day to that judgment as existing in the electors of London, is the subject of our sketch, JAMES PATTISON, Esq. He is not new to political life, having been returned for the City in the general election of the short Peel Administration of 1834-5. He was then Governor of the Bank of England—a post that necessarily invests the holder of it with an importance apart from and independent of his personal qualities. He is the responsible head of the body that controuls the whole wealth of the kingdom—he is the embodyment of the great Money-power of the empire—great in all countries and at all times, but greater in England at the present hour, than in any period or any nation known to history. He is a sort of modernised Plutus; we associate his name with the hoarding of which he seems part with vaults of "bullion" as rich as the "caves of Mammon," and quite as inaccessible. The man who stands in such a position must necessarily be a man of great "weight" in the city. Such is Mr. Pattison—and in more senses than one, for the description is both literally and metaphorically true. He is the very type of the solid virtues of the old city man of business—square and massy in his form, and adhering to the fashions of another age, delighting in drab "unmentionables," and long gaiters, contemning the "loose habits" of the present day. This adherence to old things and exploded fashions is, however, only outward; in his principles—of which most men of his stamp are peculiarly tenacious, rarely allowing any modification of them—he is of the latest school of politicians. He may be described as a thorough Liberal, in the most extensive meaning of the term, and may be cited a living proof that a maxim of "Blackwood's Magazine" that "every man with above five hundred a-year is necessarily a Conservative"—is not unimpeachable. An ex-Governor of the Bank of England, and a present Director of the same establishment, a man whose wealth being, we believe, principally capital, and therefore more exposed to risk in a political convulsion than property in land, would hardly give his support to principles which he thought subversive of the order of society. There is not any great question now agitated in the world of politics on which Mr. Pattison has not given his vote, a proof of his opinion that cannot be mistaken. He was returned for the City in 1835, and sat for it till the election of 1837, when he lost his election. During that period he voted for the ballot, for the repeal of what are called the rate paying clauses of the Reform Bill, for an enquiry into the pension list, for the removal of the civil disabilities of the Jews, for the abolition of the property qualification of members of Parliament, for church reform, for enquiry into the operation of the corn laws, and equal government for Ireland. He has given in his adherence to the Anti-Corn Law League, by whom he is strongly supported in the present contest. His political career presents no points of especial interest. He is not an active politician or a prominent party man; but he is sincere in his convictions, and consistent in maintaining them, while his social position gives those opinions an authority and influence they would not perhaps derive from his more busy advocacy. He is not brilliant, or imaginative, or eloquent, but a plain, clear, business-like speaker, ready at any time to render reasons for the faith that is in him, but as little disposed as he is capable, were he so inclined, of throwing round them the graces of oratory, which after all dazzle as frequently as they enlighten. With less ambition he would never have been distinguished from the herds of plodding men of business who may be met with daily in the spots "where merchants most do congregate;" with less talent, and fewer sterling qualities, he could not have sustained himself with the credit he has done, in the place he aspired to and attained; for you perceive at once, from his whole manner, that he is not one of those who would condescend to "shuffle, to hedge, and to shift," or beautifully "get up." Benedict is an unostentatious but most effective conductor, and the discipline of the chorus reflects the highest credit upon the drill-system of Tully.

After the opera, a new farce by Mr. Morton) was produced, entitled "My Wife's Come," —an awful announcement to some

"Who, married, long for Bachelors degrees."

It was quite successful, and deserved to be so. Harley was irresistably droll, with (in our opinion) a new version of humour compared to his "usual line of business."

The house was most fully and respectably filled, and we hope and trust it may be so every night of the season.

COVENT GARDEN

This house suddenly, and to the public unexpectedly, closed before the end of last week, in order to enable the manager to rid himself of some embarrassing persons and circumstances that threw most ungenerous and unlooked-for obstacles in the way of his liberal and praiseworthy arrangements. But let him speak for himself. The following address was prefixed to the announcement of the re-opening of the theatre on Monday last:—

"In announcing the opening of this theatre, on Monday next, for a second season, the lessee has to offer a brief explanation of the causes which have more immediately led to the premature closing of that which has just terminated. The lessee having, on the opening night, assured the public that he would make this theatre a home for the English author and actor, proceeded to redeem the pledge thus made, by an endeavour to produce a succession of novelty, and by the revival of some of the standard plays of Shakspeare. In both these attempts he much regrets to say that he was constantly thwarted and crippled, principally by those who should have been the first to aid and forward his views. The immediate and eventual consequence of this was a ruinous nightly loss to himself, and its final result an absolute necessity for closing a theatre, of the success of which, by the performance of the legitimate drama only, he cannot now retain a hope. He has, therefore, resolved to meet the evil as nearly at the outset as possible, and having thus terminated on the 19th instant, a season as brief as unfortunate, he respectfully begs to announce his intention of re-opening the theatre, under such new arrangements, and with the aid of such talent, both native and foreign, as he hopes may prove more attractive to the public, and therefore less dissimilar to himself. With a view to carry out, by every means within his power, the above design, the lessee has the honour to announce that he has, besides other attractive arrangements still pending, concluded an engagement for a series of representations with the far famed juvenile company known as 'Le Gymnase Enfantin, et les Troupe des Enfants Castelli,' whose wonderful and almost incredible performances are now the theme of admiration throughout Paris and the principal cities of France. Due notice will be given of their arrival in England, and of the night of their appearance at this theatre."

The passage in the above notice where Mr. Wallack states that he was "constantly thwarted and crippled, principally by those who should have been the first to aid and forward his views," ought not to be lightly passed over by the public.

It seems there has been some "insubordination in the camp" certain triumvirate, as we learn, wishing to have it all their own way thereby giving no fatal a blow to the resuscitation of the legitimate drama, as their predecessors did to the expiring independence of the Roman people. Without entering into particulars, we cannot but think that it was ungenerous and ungrateful in Orrin Smith so to act during the period of the campaign, when the general's views were in a great measure speculative, and the discipline or duty of his troops not more severe than they have been accustomed to elsewhere, and not half so humiliating. Could we learn, wishing to have it all their own way thereby giving no fatal a blow to the resuscitation of the legitimate drama, as their predecessors did to the expiring independence of the Roman people. Without entering into particulars, we cannot but think that it was ungenerous and ungrateful in Orrin Smith so to act during the period of the campaign, when the general's views were in a great measure speculative, and the discipline or duty of his troops not more severe than they have been accustomed to elsewhere, and not half so humiliating. Another, and perhaps more "unkind cut" which Mr. Wallack received, was the cut conditional of Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer, who demanded a hundred pounds down for permission to act his "Lady of Lyons"—to be sure, he said that the lessee might announce it as often as he pleased during the season; but probably its attraction might not have been felt more than five times during that period, and £20 a night is rather over the mark for the representation of a play which is infinitely below the lowest of modest Knowles's, in point of dramatic skill, or poetical merit; and yet, the last may be performed by any manager in the kingdom for the sum of two guineas per night, or even less, where the generous author sees that his work may materially benefit a cause or an individual! and yet Mr. Wallack agreed the literary baronet £5 per night!! With regard to the new entertainments which we have been promised in the presentation of "La Troupe des Enfans Castelli," we confess we have but a very imperfect sympathy with their abilities or power that may be juvenilities please us no more than they did Dr. Johnson, and if their excellence be ever so great, still they are usurpers of the places which should be occupied by their "elders and their betters." But what is Mr. Wallack to do as defendants, when the tide of public favour running against legitimate drama, and the pseudo writers and upholders of it conspiring to render abortive all his exertions to stem it, and "reach the fountain head once more?" Alas! with respect to the stage, we may deplore its degeneracy in the words of the patriot:

We're fallen from every joys
Star after star declays
Every bright name that shone
Light'ner the land (stage!) is fled!

"ABROAD AND AT HOME."

MISS BIRCH. This lady, whose voice is perhaps one of the purest, richest, sweetest, and most extensive soprani in the world, is engaged on a professional visit to Germany, after which it is probable she will visit the "sunny south," and ultimately intends to appear upon the stage. Miss Rainforth succeeds her at the Foundling Hospital as principal soprano.

CONCERTANT EXTRAORDINARY. In noticing Sivori's concert, the Inspired Mercury writes thus "And now, of Mr. John Parry, what shall we say? Why, that he is the most extraordinary man of his age in conversation with the lights and graces of polite society, the voice and the pianoforte together. His story-telling songs humorous and with interlined wanderings, and innocent jokes, and flashes of wit, all in the most delightful and tasteful manner, is unrivalled among artists of the day. Sudden ideas he throws out, all startling every thought, every sentiment, and every fact, in the most astonishing manner; all these things, and his own manner of talking his songs, as well as singing them, and bringing himself in it, make Mr. Parry the delightful creature he is. We could dwell upon all these things, we say, must be seen and heard, for if we were to write for a month we should not do justice to them. If laughing be wholesome, then must we hail Mr. John Parry as a most eminent physician." This is literally a little world, but in the main truth every one must coincide with the writer.

A NEW ANTIPHRASIS!—In its notices to correspondents the Times has lately put forth the following:—"Our correspondent in Paris is no doubt correct in the assertion that the translator of a drama is called the author. Such, alas! is the state of dramatic art, that authors are rarely anything else than adapters from the French." This outcry, however, is upwards of a hundred years old; for Pope, in his prologue to Cato, says:

Your scene precariously subsists too long
On French translation and Italian song.—

DARE TO BE WISE. Dare to be wise, and dare to be true.

We must confess, however, that in those days the French stage never contributed to ours one-hundredth part of the wretched stuff that it does in our time, and that a mere transmutation of a Gallic vaudeville into an English farce, would not constitute the interpreting scribe an AUTHOR!

ITALIAN OPERA, PARIS. This house opened on the 15th, with Donizetti's "Lucia," in which the new and genuine tenor (quand même), Salvi, made his first appearance, and was received with thorough Parisian enthusiasm. Ronconi also appeared at the opening, and continues, most deservedly too, to rise higher in the public estimation, or, more properly, admiration, on each new appearance; but the chief charm was the warbling of Persiani, or, as she is now called, "the nightingale," who, on this occasion, outdid all her former exertions. Grisi's debut was in her unrivalled rôle of Norma. Donizetti's new opera, "Don Sebastian," is nearly ready to be produced at the Académie de Musique.

THE WEATHER.—The Meteorological Register kept at the Horticultural Society's Gardens at Chiswick, from October 3rd to Tuesday last, gave the barometer, highest, 30·138 inch. on Oct. 3rd; and lowest, or 29·609 inch. on Oct. 10. Thermometer, highest, or 73°, on Oct 7, and lowest, or 25° (five degrees below the freezing point) on Sunday, Oct. 15th. The quantity of rain in the last part month has been 1·74 inch, or, almost above the usual average.

DEATH OF MR. ORRIN SMITH.—We regret to announce the sudden death of this ingenious engraver on wood, at Maldedon place, on Sunday morning. Mr Smith was brought up to the profession of an architect but in early life evinced a taste for engraving; though it was not until about twelve years since that he distinguished himself in the art, some of his earliest performances being the plates to Britton's and Dibdin's "Northern Tour." Orrin Smith was one of the best engravers of his day. The illustrations of "Paul et Virginie," executed a few years since for a Parisian publish were so much approved of that he immediately set about Mr. Smith's portrait appearing in the work. Our readers may frequently have observed Mr Smith's name attached to some of the most meritorious engravings in our journal. He died at the age of 44.

LOSS OF THE REGULAR.

To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

Plymouth, Oct 16, 1843.

SIR,—The man what does the "penny" for your imitator is pleased to give insertion to what he calls three additional representations of the loss of the Regulator; and he does this, he says, as a duty he owes to the public, "in consequence of the erroneous representation of this occurrence which was published at the time in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS." Do, sir, make it a matter of public duty to point out to this ethereal illustrator what a regular mess he has made of his pretended authentic sketches. He places the Regulator in a short chopping sea, such as would be knocked up off the Nore in a smart breeze, instead of the heavy roll of the Pacific in a gale. In the sketch below the sea is got quieter still; and the wonder would be, not that a boat should survive, but that she could by any possibility be lost; whilst in the third sketch all appearance of the gale has subsided. The frigate's sails are scarcely filled by a very gentle breeze, and BOTH boats are represented pulling easily towards her; whereas the frigate puked up only one boat, and it was nearly an hour afterwards before the other boat was discovered by the correcte. It is not your business to correct the wilful errors of your contemporary, but when he provokes comparisons he must abide the result

BOREAS.

[We insert the above letter only out of compliment to "Boreas." For his satisfaction we may state that our own sketch was taken by an officer on board, and forwarded to us through the respectable medium of Mr. E. Fry, of Plymouth. But with this exception in favour of "Boreas," we must remark that our rule is on no account to allude to publications of the spurious description of that which he has thought proper to castigate. ED. I. L. N.]

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

(Before Mr. Witham and a Bench of Magistrates.)

These sessions commenced on Tuesday. The calendar contained the names of 56 prisoners for trial, 38 of whom were committed for felony, and the remainder for other offences.

William Skelly, aged 16, was indicted for stealing a coral necklace, value 8s., the property of Mrs. Eyres, from the person of her daughter Maria Eyres. From her evidence it appeared that the prisoner had unbuttoned the necklace and taken it from the neck of the little girl as she was playing in the street with some other children in one neighbourhood or another, and ran off with it. The child had subsequently pointed him out from about forty boys.—The jury returned a verdict of "Guilty, with a recommendation to mercy on account of the boy's youth.—The father of the lad, who was in attendance, told the O'Divison, on being interrogated by the bench, said that he had seven children at home all younger than the prisoner, and depending upon him for support. The boy at the top would not keep either in a situation or at school, nor do anything but run about the streets. He feared he was incorrigible, and begged the magistrates to dispose of him in some way.—Mr. Armstrong said that he (the father) was in rather a singular situation. It appeared that he was merely asking to be relieved of his son at the public expense.—The father said that he had tried to get him off to the Philanthropic Society.—Mr. Armstrong said that he supposed his object now was to get him off here. He feared that he had not performed his duty as a parent.—The policeman said that he had endeavoured to bring up his son properly, and had been upwards of twelve years in the force.—The magistrates having consulted for some time, the chairman said that, under the circumstances of the case, they would not send the prisoner out of the country, and sentenced him to be well whipped and to one month's imprisonment in the House of Correction, one week to be in solitary confinement.

At the Middlesex Sessions, on Wednesday, Mr. Hughes appeared on behalf of Mrs. Frances Hart, of No. 8, Lloyd's place, Brompton-road, who exhibited articles of the gravest nature against her husband, Mr. John Hart, from which it appeared that after having been married for a period of nineteen years, he had lately commenced a course of ill-treatment towards his wife, and that, while returning home together on the 2nd October, he struck her a violent blow on the back of her ear, and said he would not be easy till he got rid of her, and threatened to set fire to the house and burn the substance and family to death, and actually searched for a knife for many his purpose unsuccessfully. On a subsequent day he broke several articles of furniture in a violent state of excitement. The Court ordered Mr. Hart to enter into his own recognizance in £20, and to find two sureties in £10 each, to keep the peace

POLICE.

CLERKENWELL. Jeremiah Caylor, a powerful athletic young man, of sullen and rather forbidding aspect, was charged with having burglariously entered the house of Mr. George Knapp, silversmith and jeweller, No. 14, High-street, Islington. Another prisoner, named Henry Harvey, a short young man, was being concerned in the offence, but he now lies at the Royal Free Hospital, Gray's inn road, having fractured his leg in a desperate attempt to escape by leaping off the roof of a house. He is out of danger, under the surveillance of the police. It would appear from the evidence that this was one of the most daring burglaries that have been committed in London since that at Mr. Westwood's, who, it will be recollected, was murdered by the burglar or burglars, and it will be seen that the present, in this case had nearly met a similar fate.—Mr. Knapp, who exhibited the marks of several severe wounds and contusions on his face, and who appeared to be labouring under great excessive debility and nervous excitement, deposed as follows:—I went to bed at about one o'clock on Sunday morning, having been the last up in the house. I had extinguished the light, and was about to compose myself to sleep, when I heard a noise. I got out of bed, but thinking it was merely the cat that caused it, I went to bed again. The noise, however, was repeated, and I rose, partly dressed myself, and cautiously stole down stairs from my bedroom, which is on the second floor. I was then without the light. I found the door of the passage leading towards the shop open. I entered the passage, and on looking into the shop saw the prisoner and the other man now in the hospital, standing by the counter at the window, where the most valuable part of my stock of watches and jewellery was deposited. They had a light. Immediately on seeing them I cried out "Hallo! thieves!" murder!" upon which the light was instantly extinguished, and they commenced their attack upon me. I could distinctly see the persons and features of the men. One of them (Harvey) on hearing me call out, ran along by the counter, through the adjoining parlour, and out at the window, and thus effected his escape for the time. Mr. Greenwood was at in jumping from the window that the man Harvey broke his leg?—Mr. Knapp: No, sir; it was in crossing a wall subsequently. That window is not more than a few feet from the ground. The other now at the bar attempted to escape in the same manner, and ran towards the parlour door; but before he could regain it I seized him round the waist. He struck me violently with his clenched fist and kicked me with all his force in striving to extricate himself. We rolled on the ground together. He then got upon me and exclaimed, "Now by ——, I will knock your —— life out." I, however, still clung to him with all my might, and both of us rose together. He continued to beat me in a most savage manner, and being stronger than I, made his way to the window. When there he gave me a violent blow which blinded me for a time. The prisoner was getting out of the window, when I seized him by the leg, his body hanging out of the window. With the other leg he kicked me on the head, and on the throat and breast. I retained my hold until he gave me a kick on the left eye, which obliged me to relinquish it, as the blow stupified me for a moment. He fell heavily on the flags below, but having speedily recovered myself, I jumped out after him and seized him by the throat. We again both rose to our feet, and he again kicked me most violently on the head. We had a most desperate struggle, in the course of which we fell and rose together several times, the prisoner continuing to beat and kick me with savage violence. The prisoner at length jumped upon the dust bin, and endeavoured to escape from me, but I caught hold of it and prevented him. The prisoner then caught hold of my left leg, when I received another violent kick on the head which caused me to relinquish my hold, and the prisoner released from my grasp, had jumped upon the roof of an outhouse, when several police constables arrived to my assistance, and the prisoner was finally secured. In answer to a question from Mr. Greenwood, whether all the lost property had been found, the prosecutor said he had not. He had been struggling with him for nearly 15 minutes. Police constable Window, 385 N, said he was on duty in Maiden-lane, near the New Crown and Anchor, at the witness's request, but not before witness had minutely observed their persons and dress, for he suspected that their intentions were not of the best kind. Soon after them all he heard cries of "Police!" "Police!" proceed from Mr. Knapp's house at a quarter past two o'clock. When witness reached the house there was a large crowd round the door in High-street, who were crying out that the robbers in the house. The door in High-street, who were crying out that the robbers in the house. The door in High-street, who were crying out that the robbers in the house. The door was open. Witness ran round into White Lion-street, at the back of the house. At the foot of a lofty wall there the man Harvey was lying groaning from pain. He was in a state of great weakness. (Laughter.) Finding that his kick would not succeed, he became very violent, and refused to leave the place, on which witness was obliged to drag him over the roofs of the houses. His dress was dripping wet, and his hands were covered with blood. Lucifer matches, a knife, and several pawnbrokers duplicates, were found on him. Blood was likewise on the palings affixed to some of the watches in Mr. Knapp's shop. In spector Thatcher deposed that when the prisoner was brought to the station-house he was perfectly sober. His dress was wet and bloody. The prisoner swore that if there had been only two constables there he would soon have got the better of them. The other man (Caylor) had been brought to witness, finding that his leg was broken, sent for the police surgeon, who directed his removal to the hospital. Moore, 20 N, deposed to having taken up the watches and gold rings now produced from the floor of the shop, where they were collected in a handkerchief ready for removal. The hunting-case belonged to the man Harvey. There were in all thirty eight watches, twenty nine silver, five gold, and four metal and twenty-six gold rings. The prisoner, who at first sullenly denied that he had anything to do with the transaction at length said he should reserve his defence for another occasion. He was committed pro forma, the whole of the witnesses being bound over to appear at the Old Bailey.

UNION HALL.—Thomas Langridge, a native of Hartfield, in Sussex, attended for the purpose of giving informat on of his having been robbed of £300 in sovereigns, Bank of England notes, and cheques, on Saturday night, under the following circumstances:—He stated that he had been at Mayfield's hall fair, in Hampshire, where he received a considerable sum of money in the course of last week; that, while sauntering about the fair he was accosted by a strange man, with whom he entered into conversation, and that shortly afterwards they were joined by two other men, and that they all conversed affably together on the subjects connected with the fair. They all separated, he having acquainted his new companions that he was going up to town, and on Saturday he met them again in the Strand, and they invited him to dine with them at a house in Hungerford-market. After dinner they proposed a walk, and took him over to see the Thames tunnel, and from thence to the St. Helena-gardens at Rotherhithe. At this latter place they had refreshment, and the conversation turned on the number of pocket-pockets that infested the town, and they all advised him to be cautious and not expose his money, as he would be robbed of it. One of the men then took open exhibited a bundle of what appeared to be Bank notes, while another took them from his hands, and, wrapping them up, placed them in the watch-fob of the owner, Langridge was then advised to adopt the same precaution with his money, and he, under the impression that his new acquaintances were strictly honest men, was induced to follow their advice, and he accordingly drew forth his bag, containing upwards of £300 in gold, notes, and cheques, and, giving it into the hands of one of them, he held his fob pocket open while the cash and notes were thrust down for safety into the bottom of the pocket. Soon after this the three men left the room, and did not return. When he subsequently examined the fob he was quite astonished to find that some palmed their accomplice. In this latable sort he was kindly assisted by Miss Sorbon, of this town, Miss Pearce, of Gloucester, and several other visitors, as well as by Mr. W. Hudson, of the Post Office. It is expected that a subscription will immediately be set on foot for the unfortunate emigrants

CANNON, Oct. 18.—The morning, at about one o'clock, is came on suddenly to how fresh from the north-west, and at two it had increased to a perfect hurricane, so much so, that upon the beach and in exposed places it was almost impossible to stand or sand In the course of yesterday, as the weather was exceedingly fine and calm, a number of fishing boats, each containing a crew of four or five men left Cromer, and, as the wind, &c., at that time were highly favourable, there is no doubt they went off to a great distance; for in such cases they frequently run their nets to an extent of four or five miles. Many of these boats are open and undecked, and not more than twenty feet long, and the largest of the fleet is of very slight construction against the number or other vessels. The immense size of the number that went out were in sight, and, up to the present hour, two o'clock, pm., nothing has been seen or heard of them. There is one unenviable exception—a boat, which contained five men, has been washed ashore at Bacton, near Mundesley one body was then found, and there is not the least doubt but that the whole crew have found a watery grave. One poor fellow has left a wife and five children, and the rest, one only excepted, have left families to mourn their loss. A vessel, the Friendship, from Goole, laden with chalk, has also come ashore at the same place, with a smaller kind of craft, called a Lobbuoy, which was run ashore, and the mate, a Cromer man, lost his life. It is difficult to ascertain the number of boats absent, but it is commonly said, twelve or fourteen. Their fate is, of course, doubtful, but very serious apprehensions are entertained for some of them. Some vessels are in sight, and one, apparently a large brig, has a signal of distress in her mast-head. Mr. Mesmerist went out along the coast, and it is feared dreadful accounts will be brought in in the morning.

STORM OF THE COAST.—DISASTROUS CONSEQUENCES

MARGATE, Wednesday.—One of the most sudden and severe gales which have been experienced for many years sprung up early this morning, from the N.N.E., and there being no anchorage the barque Emma, from Honduras, laden with mahogany, on the Nayland Rock, close to the entrance of the Pier, misses the mark. The splendidly new built emigrant ship, Rochampton, Captain Cowley, bound for Port Phelip, was also stranded on the pier point, and by the commissioners for the Harbour of Refuge, about a mile and a half east of the town. Through the undaunted courage of our sailors, we have the pleasure of stating that all on board were saved, amounting in number to 70 adults and 30 children, exclusive of the crew. The situation of the ship is very precarious but it is hoped she will hold together. The poor emigrants, as may be readily supposed, are in a truly pitiable condition, having lost every article of clothing, and all their stores. Two of our small boats went alongside the vessel, and brought the poor people safely through a tremendous surf, which drenched them to the skin. They were then conveyed into the town in carts; when the worthy agent of the White Hart, seeing their deplorable plight, in a truly Christian spirit, took a portion of them into his house, provided them with a change of raiment, and otherwise administered to their necessities. In this laudable work he was kindly assisted by Miss Sorbon, of this town, Miss Pearce, of Gloucester, and several other visitors, as well as by Mr. W. Hudson, of the Post Office. It is expected that a subscription will immediately be set on foot for the unfortunate emigrants

EPITOME OF NEWS.

The three planets, Jupiter, Saturn, and Mars, are visible every evening, in the horizon to the south-east, between the constellations of Aquarius, Capricornus, and Sagittarius. Jupiter is more brilliant than it has been for many years. The planet Mercury is favourably situated for observation in the mornings, at the end of October and beginning of November, and on the 1st of December Mars will be in conjunction with Jupiter. These two brilliant planets will then be seen at about five in the evening, at a small distance from each other on the same vertical line

PORTRAIT OF CAPTAIN JAMES ROSS.

The recent return of Captain James R— from his expedition to the South Pole suggests a fitting opportunity for presenting to our readers the portraiture of this intrepid commander.

His voyages and discoveries in the south polar seas extend over the three years 1841, 1842, and 1843; and the following is a summary of the results:—A large tract of lofty land, covered with snow and ice, extending probably 500 miles east and west, was discovered right south from New Zealand, between lat. 72 and 79, and named South Victoria. On it they discovered a volcanic mountain 12,000 feet in height, emitting flames, which they named Mount Erebus. It is in lat. 77 32, long. 167 E. They reached the latitude of 78 4, the highest southern latitude ever attained by some hundred miles. Captain Ross found that Gauss's determination of the magnetic pole was erroneous; and his own observations enabled him to assign as its position a point in the interior of South Victoria, in lat. 76, and east long. 153, but which, unhappily, he could not reach. They then returned to Van Diemen's Land. We give a few of the concluding details of the proceedings of the third year, selected from the copious report in the Literary Gazette. It should be mentioned that Captain Ross accompanied his uncle, Sir John Ross, in his expedition to the north; and he is understood to have contributed mainly to the scientific results of the enterprise.

The struggles with the ice continued till the 1st of February, when it became essential to extricate the ships, and endeavour to penetrate to the south. On the 4th they succeeded in gaining the pack-edge, and were once more in clear water, after having been more or less entangled for the space of forty days. East winds and thick fogs prevailed, and the best of the season was passed. They, however, in lat. 65 degrees nearly crossed Weddell's returning track, and found pack-ice where he had perfectly clear sea. They could not penetrate beyond lat. 65 deg 15 min. S. On the 22nd, they crossed the line of the no-variation in lat. 61 deg and long. 24 deg. W. in a dip of 57 deg. 40 min.; a fact of much importance to magnetic science, since the observations appear to prove that the supposition of there being two magnetic poles of verticity in the south, (as is well known to be the case in the north), is erroneous, and that there is in reality but one magnetic pole in the southern hemisphere.

The whole of this year's observations tend in a remarkable manner to confirm the position assigned to this pole by Captain Ross from his first year's experiments in its close vicinity.

On the 23d they rounded the last extreme of the pack, and stood to the S.E., and crossed the antarctic circle on the 1st of March, in long 7½ deg. W. From judicious considerations, Capt. Ross now tried to penetrate to the southward in the meridian exactly between Bellinghausen's and Weddell's tracks, and, consequently, stood to the S.W. On the 23rd, in lat. 68 deg. 34 min., and long. 12 deg. 49 min. W., he was becalmed, and seized the opportunity to try for soundings, but 4,000 fathoms of line failed to reach the ground. This great depth is against the probability of meeting with land near. For some time, however, they persevered in an attempt to get farther to the south, but the ice was too strong for them; and considerable danger was encountered in a tempestuous gale, which lasted, without interruption, during three days.

On the 17th they reached the latitude of Bouvet Island, 64 deg. 19 min., about 6 deg. to the westward of the assigned position; but they, like Cook, searched for it in vain; and Captain Ross concludes that Bouvet had been deceived by the form of an iceberg. The last berg was seen on the 20th, in lat 47 deg 3 min. S. and long. 10 deg. 51 min. E. when bearing away before a fair gale for the Cape of Good Hope, where the expedition prosperously anchored on the 4th of April.

In the third season, it will thus be seen, they did not penetrate so far as Weddell; yet the unusual prevalence of easterly winds preventing the pack from drifting off shore, was the means of enabling them to reach the lat. of 71½ deg. S. on a meridian usually occupied by the pack when driven by the prevailing westerly winds from the east shore of Graham's Land, and extending their researches in that meridian (15 deg. W.) 12 deg. of latitude beyond their predecessors Cook, Bellingausen, and Biscoe.

The discovery and examination of a considerable extent of unknown coast, proving the insularity of those portions of land first discovered by Bransfield in 1820, for years afterwards frequented by our sealers in search of their prey, and, finally, in 1839, seen by Admiral D'Urville, and called by him "Louis Philippe's Land," cannot but be regarded as important additions to our knowledge of those parts, which though islands of inconsiderable size, might have extended, and were supposed to extend, even to the pole.

At the end of April the Erebus and Terror left the Cape of Good Hope, and touched at St. Helena and Ascension, for the purpose of repeating the magnetic observations they had formerly made, and verifying their instruments. In order to render the whole series complete, it was necessary to repair to Rio de Janeiro which the expedition reached on the 16th June. After a few days employed in observing and refitting, they sailed for England, and, touching at one of the Western Islands, made the land of Scilly on the 27th of August.

The acquisitions to natural history, geology, geography, but, above all, towards the elucidation of the grand mystery of terrestrial magnetism, raise this voyage to a pre-eminent rank amongst the greatest achievements of British courage, intelligence, and enterprise.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

It is singular that while the character of our landed capitalists is so decidedly aristocratic, the spirit of their sports should be so emphatically democratic. All our rural pastimes, indeed, are not so—but the most generally popular are—to the limits of licence. Fox-hunting—the very idea of which sets on "an Englishman's pulse with a horse power unknown to hydrometry"—is a sample of the equestrian system, wherein liberty and equality reign absolute; and on the turf not to speak it profanely—none are before or after other, save as they shall make them our especial speed. Like your poet—your racer "nascitur non fit," he is the exception to the rule, and while my Lord Exeter with a stud purchased without regard to expence," or numbers, and cared for as lavishly as the charger of a Roman Emperor, cannot win a Derby or a Leger on the quiet burgher of the most quiet of country quarters, happening by a foal which he did not know what to do with—beats all the horses in the world—as if to turn to scorn all method, craft—principalities and powers—"but Mr. Wrather won the St. Leger by accident" it certainly would be hazardous to insist that it was by "good guidance," but his good luck had good limbs and lungs to assist it. It is to be regretted that such use or abuse should have subsequently been made of Nutwith. He is a wiry, lazy, lasting animal, for whom the Leger course was too short, and who run over it wholly because Prizefighter's pace threw the field into disorder; and Nutwith has the pluck of a bull dog, as well as a turn of foot. In a short scramble among two-year-olds he was most unwisely associated, and therefore let not his defeat at Richmond be had as a criterion of his pretensions. But this is from the purpose, which was to show that our national sports are, both in cause and consequence, worthy the spirit of our time and our country. Is not free woodcraft well befitting the sons of a soil whose touch is liberty!

> Hold we all pomps and vanities at nought,
> For gold can purchase them—as gold it [illegible] ght,
> We make the gem as [illegible]
> At [illegible] as [illegible] pride!

The approaching week, which will bring the present turf season to a close, bids fair to be a graceful winding-up of a graceful plot. It has not been our ungrateful duty to bear record of any overt acts of especial evil during its progress, and albeit there have occurred here and there small items that might better have been left out of the account, the total is altogether on the credit side. The engagements made for the Houghton Meeting are, with one exception, none of them of long perspective, the only issue set down for decision during the last week of the year in the Book, Calendar, being the Criterion. This is a two-year-old stake, run over the most trying ground at Newmarket, (indeed the most trying two-year-old course in England), and hence its name of the Criterion. It includes several of the best of the Derby favourites for next year, and the field of thirty-seven on paper will probably give us a good muster at the post. The quotations at foot show what people think will be the result—but people (and prophets) are invariably wrong about the results of the two-year-old races in the last meeting, and the very is this. The tug of the betting lies in the Cambridgeshire Handicap, for which there will be, no doubt, as good business done as there was for the Cesarewitch. Twenty horses backed at odds, say from 6 to 1 (as an average)—£20 to £1 make pretty playthings for the industrious. The lot in the market (indeed in the field) is much better than that brought to the post, whether for starting or telling, in the Second October. The race will be won by a racer—not an extreme outsider, as it should seem—but we are not going to do the sublime: if you are right, a generation of vipers insists that it was a chance shot and if you miss it "writes you down an ass."

We here present our readers with a portrait of Corranna, the property of Mr. Boyce, and the winner of the Cesarewitch Stakes, value £1195, at the late Newmarket meeting, from a sketch by Mr. Hall, of Newmarket. Corranna stands fifteen hands two inches high; is a beautiful bright bay, approaching chesnut; black legs, with hind off-foot white; nose taper, head well set on a fine neck, well up in the withers, deep in the brisket, and altogether well furnished.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

"CROMWELL'S PALACE," BERMONDSEY.

The demolition of this abode of the Protector having been commenced, to picture its front in our pages may be interesting. The house in question has, until lately, existed nearly in its original state, as "the Jamaica Tavern," and is situated at the extremity of the parish of Bermondsey.

Cromwell, at the period of his residence at this palace, had very extensive grounds attached, which have now been made into fine garden-grounds near London, extending a considerable distance down what is called the "Jamaica Level." It has been ascertained that from the residence itself a subterraneous passage, of nearly half a mile in length, reaches to the platform at Rotherhithe, and thence branching obliquely has been formed as an underground way to old Bermondsey Church, a mile fully in extent. It is said that these passages were made great use of in the riots of Lord George Gordon, in 1780, and that then they could be easily traversed.

The following anecdote is related of Rubini:—The illustrious maestro having been informed that his statue in white marble was about to be erected as an ornament to the forum of his native town, he, with his habitual insouciance, and little touched with the honour intended him, demanded how much it would cost. On being answered that the expense would be 1,200f., he said, "Well, then, let them give me the money, and when the day intended for the inauguration arrives, I will place myself in propriâ personâ on the pedestal, so that the town will enjoy the original instead of a copy, and I shall be 1,200f the richer."

ORLEANS RAILWAY.—The prosecution against the Orleans Railroad Company and its officers, founded upon the accident which happened on the 18th of July last, was brought to trial on Wednesday last, before the Correctional Tribunal of Etampes. After the interrogation of the accused parties, and the examination of witnesses, the Procureur du Roi addressed the tribunal in support of the prosecution. Three counsel having been heard in defence, the judges retired to consider their sentence, and, on returning into court, acquitted all the accused parties, except M. Lassange, the chief of the train, and Loison, the sixth conducteur. The first they condemned to pay a fine of 100f., and the second of 50f. The directors of the company were included in the prosecution, in order that they might be made responsible for any damages that any of the sufferers might come forward to claim; but the company had fully satisfied all such claims out of court, and therefore none were made at the trial.

ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE THE POPE.—A letter from Rome, of the 27th ultimo, in the Gazette de France, says:—"A report has probably reached you of an attempt to assassinate the Pope. The fact is, that a physician, who is a great revolutionist, but driven to desperation by want of money, went one day to the Palace, and, although he has a wooden leg, entered as nimbly as if it had been his own house. Being met, and asked whom he wanted, he replied that he wished to speak to his Holiness on very urgent affairs. With much difficulty he was induced to withdraw. On reaching the court he fired a pistol, without its being perceived that it was he who caused the explosion. The next day he returned, and went on until he met Cajetaino, the Pontiff's valet, to whom he insisted on being immediately allowed to see the Pope on matters of high interest. His entrance was, however, again refused, and he went away, but he was arrested on leaving the Palace. A loaded pistol was found upon him."

THE FITZWILLIAM MUSEUM, CAMBRIDGE.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO CAMBRIDGE.

Since George the Fourth visited Oxford there has not been such excitement in an university town as there is likely to be in Cambridge on the occasion of Her Majesty's intended visit to that far-famed seat of learning. On Wednesday the Rev. Mr. Whewell, B.D., Master of Trinity and Vice-Chancellor; the Rev. Dr French, Master of Jesus, and the Rev. Mr. Birkett, B.D., of Emmanuel, were appointed a syndicate, "to make such arrangements as may appear to them proper for the reception of Her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert in the Senate-house." The Royal visitors are expected on Wednesday, the 25th, on which occasion his Grace the Duke of Northumberland, Chancellor of the University, the Lord High Chancellor, Lord High Steward, the Vice-Chancellor, the Heads of Houses, and an immense number of Masters of Arts in residence, will receive them in state, and conduct them to the lodge of Trinity-college, which is now being prepared for their reception. The lodge is, by the charter of Henry VIII., who originally endowed this college, the residence of the Sovereign on the occasion of any Royal visit, and is always made use of, according to a provision in the charter, by Her Majesty's going judges of assize.

On Thursday the Senate-house will present a very splendid and interesting appearance. On this occasion the Chancellor will confer the degree of Doctor of Laws on his Royal Highness Prince Albert. In the evening the Vice-Chancellor will entertain the Royal party in state, and all the colleges, as well as the town, will be lit up. In the grounds of St. John's College, as well as in the adjacent ones of Trinity, rival displays of fireworks will take place. During Thursday, her Majesty will visit the new and beautiful structure of the Fitzwilliam Museum, of which we subjoin an accurate engraving. The first stone of this building was laid in 1837. It is from the designs of Mr. George Basevi, the successful competitor among a very great number. In its plan it forms very nearly a square of about 160 feet, and has the advantage of being not only quite insulated, but also of being backed by the grove of St. Peter's College, lying to the west of it. It, moreover, presents four finished elevations. The principal, or east front, towards Trumpington-street, shown in our view, is a rich composition, with fourteen fluted Corinthian columns, surmounted by a pediment, and so arranged as to form a peristyle or projecting octastyle, advanced one column beyond the lateral colonnades, which thus constitute a part of the general portico, and may be entered through the pavilions at the ends. These last-mentioned terminations to the façade carry on the order in intercolumns, containing a niche, with a sculptured panel both above and below it. The whole is raised upon a stylobate, with a single flight of steps leading up to and between the columns of the projecting centre. The façade altogether presents much piquant and scenic effect, which is aided by the absence of windows, and the substitution of niches to be filled with statues, besides others on pedestals. Although somewhat plainer in themselves, the three other sides have the same entablature as the principal front, and are ornamented with fluted Corinthian pilasters.

The interior is in a corresponding style of magnificence. The hall, the upper part of which, on the level of the principal floor, serves also as a sculpture-gallery, is an exceedingly happy specimen of Italian architecture, and produces a very imposing coup d'œil on entering, notwithstanding the spaciousness and decorative character of the portico. Some of the other rooms are the most splendid of their kind in the country; and the whole of the interior will, we are persuaded, be greatly admired for its taste and elegance by the illustrious visitors in the ensuing week.

SCENE FROM "THE OLD GUARD," AT THE PRINCESS'S THEATRE.

PRINCESS'S THEATRE.

Our engraving pictures the most effective situation in Mr. Boursicault's clever one-act drama of the "Old Guard." Melanie, the old soldier's daughter, being left alone, Lord Beauville enters the room, and renews his dishonourable proposals, which Melanie, as before, indignantly rejects; when, upon a signal, his lordship's servant appears, and they together endeavour to force the struggling girl out of the apartment. Her shrieks arouse Havresack (the Old Guard), who rushes from his chamber, musket in hand, and presents it at the baffled Beauville; whilst Melanie falls at the feet of her indignant father. At this moment another person enters the apartment, Henri Lefebvre, whom Havresack had previously recognised as the son of General Lefebvre, who had expired in his arms on the field of battle, and the dénouement follows. The excellence of the "situation," the impassioned acting of Morris Barnett, and the touching naturalness of Madame Prosper, at this point, nightly receive the heartfelt applause of the delighted audience.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—We are requested to state that the Phormio of Terence will be acted by the Westminster boys as usual this year, with the Prologue and Epilogue in the seventh and third tasks!

COLONIAL POSTAGE.—In virtue of powers conferred upon the treasury, by several acts of parliament, an order has been published in the Gazette of Tuesday regulating through the rates of postage in the following places, viz., British North America, or within the British West Indies, or between British North America or the British West Indies. The order, amongst other matters, states, that in lieu of the present mode of charging by the number of enclosures, the charge shall be by weight, in conformity with a scale which the order sets forth. The scale rises according to weight by ounces and half ounces, as to distance by spaces of sixties and hundreds of miles, and as to amount of postage by sums of 2d., 4d., and 8d.

CHAPTER XXVIII

THE WILL

NOTWITHSTANDING the conciliatory tone assumed by Charles before they quitted Sir Arthur's room, and all his endeavours of Lucrece to impart a high appreciation of his worth, Caroline's hatred of Lucrece did not be subdued. She appeared to detest his very name, and commanded Lucrece not to allude to him in her presence.

"I have been deeply wronged!" she exclaimed, at their first interview—"bitterly persecuted! grossly insulted!—cruelly denounced!—and now that I am free, my cowardly enemies shall feel the full weight of my revenge!"

"But, dear sister, Charles is not your enemy!" urged Lucrece.

"He is my enemy!—one of the greatest enemies I have! By him I have been vilely insulted and denounced."

"But where, dear Caroline?—where?"

"Here, in our own house! He it was that stood between me and my husband: it was he who—knowing that I was perfectly unprotected—would not allow me to see him until the very last! daring, at the same time, plainly to assert that I had killed him! Oh! I shall not forget that!"

"Indeed, dear Caroline, he could not have meant it: you must, dear, have misunderstood him."

"No! he was not to be misunderstood! But I desire that his name may be mentioned to me no more. He is in my house still, I presume. Let him not remain. He is not wanted here. The sooner he leaves the better."

"But, Caroline! surely you do not mean this?"

"I do. Understand Lucrece, I have no ill feeling towards you. It is against him that my feelings are excited."

"But Caroline, dear, you will require some assistance!"

"If I need it, I can have the assistance of friends: my enemies are the very last to whom I shall apply. I shall, at all events, need no assistance from Arm."

"I cannot, dear, believe him to be your enemy!"

"I know that he is, and for me, that's sufficient. He had better leave my house at once."

To Lucrece, who knew not the whole of the facts—the circumstance of Caroline having been prevented from seeing Sir Arthur until the last moment, did appear harsh—nay, cruel. She could not understand it. Nothing in her view, could justify such a proceeding. It appeared to be perfectly monstrous! But when she admitted that Caroline had reason to feel indignant, she could not believe that this species of cruelty had either been practised or sanctioned by Charles.

She, therefore, on leaving Caroline, questioned him on the subject, and expressed her conviction that the proceeding had been unauthorised by him; but when he had explained to her why the apparently harsh course had been adopted, she admitted its justice, and lamented the cause.

"But," she added, with an earnest expression, "had we not better leave, dear?"

"Why no! for, I did not intend to leave the house until after the funeral!"

"Let us leave now. I think it will be better. Things may be unpleasant. Besides, dear Charles, you need repose."

"Your sister is anxious for me to leave, I presume?"

"Why yes—she does appear to wish to be alone."

"Well, my love, I will not oppose her. We'll go to your father's."

"There's a dear. We can do no good now by remaining."

"Very true: very true. Well, Lucrece, tell her we are now about to leave, and I'll direct one of the servants to bring a coach to the door."

Lucrece did so, and Charles, who felt nearly exhausted, rang the bell, and sent for a coach; and having given directions for the delivery of their luggage to Greville's servant, they left the house with their infant and the maid.

That Caroline felt that she had in reality been the object of bitter persecution may be easily conceived. She entirely lost sight of the cause while indignantly viewing the effect. She would not now suffer herself to admit that she had committed an offence: the penalty she would not now suffer herself to admit that she had committed an offence: the penalty she would not now suffer herself to admit that she had committed an offence: the penalty she room adjoining, and proceeded to relate to him the wrongs she had endured, and the bitter persecution of which she had been the victim.

"But has all this been done without a cause?" inquired Fred, having listened to her with rapt attention.

"Why—why, certainly a cause," returned Caroline. "Has not my brother told you that jealousy was the cause?"

"But did you have no cause for jealousy?"

"Certainly not."

"Then I have been much deceived."

"Oh, your cause has also been created then—has it? You have been also set against me? No matter. I see now it is. Thank heaven, I am now independent of you all, and in a position to bid you all defiance."

"Caroline! are you mad?"

"No, sir, I am not mad, but resolved to repel every attack, let it come from what quarter it may."

"I have made no attack, remember that. I merely said that if you have given no cause for this jealousy it must have been deceived. But who is this scoundrel, by whom you have been induced thus to hast your reputation

"Do you know, sir, to whom you are speaking?

"Certainly. I should else have no right to speak as I do"

"You have no rights as it is."

"As your brother, Caroline, I have. Who and what is he?"

"A friend."

"Before Tom, Caroline, to be your bitterest enemy!"

"Indeed"

"Come, sit down, and let me convince you of the fact"

"You cannot do it"

"Well, well, let us talk over the matter calmly"

"When I need your advice, sir, I'll apply to you for it—till then I beg you'll give yourself no further trouble."

"Caroline, you are indeed greatly changed"

"I am! I know that I am! Persecution has effected that change, which you will find by and by more strongly developed still."

"I am sorry to hear it"

"Do not, on my account, be sorry. I assure I am perfectly well able to take care of myself. Be sorry for those who have dared to insult me! They shall suffer if I live."

"Oh, Caroline, Caroline, you talk very foolish."

"Indeed"

"How is it possible for you to injure those persons by whom you imagine yourself to have been insulted?"

"We shall see"

"Well! it is perfectly useless to dwell upon this subject now. When you are somewhat less excited I will talk to you, as Caroline, for heaven's sake, make no more enemies"

"All are at liberty to be enemies if they please. I care now for no one, being independent of all. Were the whole world my enemy it would not move me now, feeling as I do feel secure in my own honour!"

"Well," said Fred, fancying that he had better not pursue the subject then, "shall I dine with you to-day?"

"I wish to be alone."

"Oh, very well"

"At any other time"

"I do not think, Caroline, that at any other time I shall find it exactly convenient to dine with you!"

"Well, sir, you must use your own discretion"

"I will," replied Fred, "be assured I will."

He then returned to Greville and Lucrece, and with them soon took leave of Caroline, whom hearing throughout had been haughty in the extreme.

From that time till eight o'clock Dursley was in a state of intense anxiety. He felt that that evening his fate would be decided. He had no cause to fear that that decision would be adverse. on the contrary, he had every reason to believe it would be in his favour; but the cause of his hopes, still he could not but feel appreciative that her brother, or some other member of the family, had opened her eyes to the duplicity of that very fair creature. apprehension kept him in a fever of excitement until the hour appointed had arrived.

At that hour, punctual y of course, he was with her, and his fears were immediately hushed by the manner in which she received him; but when she had explained to him how she had been treated by Charles and how firmly she had refused to have either him or any part of the family in the house, he felt himself more than ever bound to her, and more than ever secure then ever

"Now, Mr. Darnley," she observed when all this had been explained in a manner which convinced him that she felt that she had been deeply wronged, "my object in wishing to see you this evening is to consult you upon a subject with which I am not conversant, but which you will enable me, doubtless, to understand. You are the only creature living with whom I would, under the circumstances, enter into this subject, but as I feel that you are indeed a friend, with you I do so without hesitation"

"I feel honoured by your confidence, Lady Cleveland," returned Darnley, "and that you will ever find me worthy of it I think you believe"

"I do," replied Caroline earnestly, "I am now about to prove that I do. This," she added, producing a document, and placing it before him, "This is a copy of Sir Arthur's will It is a copy which I myself took unperceived by any one immediately after the original had been signed. Now, there is in that will one point which I am anxious to have explained, as it does not now appear to accord exactly with the intentions of the testator, but perhaps you will do me the favour to read it over and tell me what you understand by it"

Darnley, with far more eagerness than he wished to display, took the copy and read with the utmost care, and as he did so his countenance assumed almost an appearance of feelings of delight; which it had exceed

"Well," said he at length, "this seems quite clear That which I understand by it is that Sir Arthur leaves the whole of his property of every description to you, with the exception of ten thousand pounds to his nephew, a thousand pounds to each of the executors, and a few trifling legacies."

"Exactly. Now the point, which, in the first place, I wish to have explained, is that which has reference to his nephew. Is it your opinion that he understood that sum to be all of them, immediately before this will was made, he stated that although he was anxious to leave his nephew something, he wished it to be of his own earning, and understanding that whatever he might leave him would be subject to my approval, I consented to his putting down ten thousand pounds, and, therefore, all I wish now to know, whether I have not still the absolute control over this sum, it having been clearly understood at the time that it was to be in reality, subject to my approval

"Why, that which was to be subject to your approval, I apprehend was the fact of its being put in the will! You consented to this, and it was put in, and therefore you have no control over it now"

"What not as my consent was obtained expressly with that understanding?"

"My dear Lady Cleveland, I am sorry to say that whether it was inserted with or without an understanding of that kind, whether it was with your consent, the fact of its being there is sufficient Sir Arthur has left him ten thousand pounds, and that sum he must have"

Are you sure of that"—said Caroline, who felt much annoyed and hot her lips with vexation "quite sure?"

"Quite," replied Darnley, "there cannot be a doubt about his having entitled to it. I went with him my finger that it were not so, for after the contumelious manner in which he has treated you I should glory in at being subject to your approval"

"I certainly understood that it was to be so"

"You must have misunderstood the meaning. He wished to do nothing without your consent. This must be submitted for your approval You did approve of it; you consented to his being placed in the will. Had you known then as much as you now know you would not have given that consent—"

"I would not, indeed!"

"But as you gave it then, and the item is in the will, you have no control over it whatever."

"And the apples, of course, to the sums which have been left to the executors also?"

"Precisely"

"Well! I am not vindictive—"

"Of that I am quite sure"

"But if I had possessed the power which I fancied I possessed, not one of them should ever have had a shilling"

"And you would have acted right—perfectly right. However, as unhappily you have not that power, let me hope you not to allow the fact to annoy you. But," he added, with the view of forming something like a correct idea of what Sir Arthur had died worth, "is this rather a large sum to be left with your consent, even nominally, to this nephew"

"Oh the sum is comparatively inconsiderable. I do not look at that. I'd give twenty thousand pounds to have the control over the ten. I care nothing whatever for the amount. All I look at is the fact of his having that power to annoy me"

"I see I understand perfectly."

"I feared that it was so when I read this to-day for the first time since it was written. It struck me in a moment that although my control was understood at the time, the fact of its not being specified in the will, rendered that understanding valueless."

"Unfortunately that is correct. But my dear Lady Cleveland, do not let this distress you! treat the matter with contempt."

"I will do so. He will assuredly suffer"

"For the day for the annual meeting has arrived" rejoined Darnley, assuming a mournful expression

"It is to take place on Monday," replied Caroline

"Well," resumed Darnley, with the utmost caution, "death is, indeed, a solemn thing to contemplate. A very solemn thing. Every one should be prepared for it, and as much as possible to be regarded with deep affliction circumstances, for example, like those under which I am here I cannot for a moment suppose it to be expected to feel deeply affected seeing that I cannot but view the occurrence as one tending to the refreshment of my prospects, hopes"

Caroline sighed, and seemed thoughtful.

"It is indeed sad," continued Darnley, exceedingly sad. But as the brightest happiness is not unfrequently the child of misfortune, so may some result from it, and I trust that it will prove be when we have within ourselves the power to cast that veil aside. Dear Caroline, I hope to be permitted to call you so still this power is yours. Are you not possessed of it—"

"Darnley," said Caroline, with some emotion, "I must beg of you not to pursue this subject I feel it to be one which ought not to be dwelt upon now.

"Forgive me, I will not dwell upon it. Your delicacy of feeling I more than ever admire, and will therefore be silent. But, my dearest, you will permit me to call before this mournful business is over?"

"Why it will be, I think, better to defer your visits until I am somewhat more alone than I can expect to be for the next few days. I shall, of course, have these persons calling frequently whom I cannot refuse to see, and rather than encounter, like you to meet"

"I understand," replied Darnley, "I perfectly understand. But, if there be anything on earth that I can do to serve you, you know that you may command me you, moreover, know that I shall feel highly honored by your commands. You will, therefore, I hope, not forget that you have a friend, upon whom you can trust."

Caroline promised that he should be remembered, and with a heart filled with ecstacy he left her. He felt that he should now be a man of wealth indeed and at once fixed the amount at half a million It must be more—it might be a million. He would call that Sir Arthur had died worth? who could tell, when Caroline had spoken of ten of thousands as being comparatively inconsiderable sums? The amount might be a million and a half But if even it were only half a million, it would enable him to eclipse in style and extravagance all competitors, including Tom, and a four in hand in London, a pack of hounds at his lodge, and a magnificent seat at Newmarket were among the thousand absolutes or indispensable things which flitted across his fiery imagination.

On the other hand, Caroline was not unhappy. The fact of being unable to "persist" Charles by withholding that which Sir Arthur had left him, deeply, poignantly wounded her pride. What would she not have given for that control which she had always imagined she possessed? what sacrifice would she not have made for the power to gratify that fondly cherished feeling of revenge.

In, however, this was now impossible, she resolved instead of making her vexation apparent—to bear proudly up against the defeat thus sustained, congratulating herself upon the fact that Charles would not be ever to be remembered by her.

The week wore away; and as Sir Arthur had expressed a desire that the funeral might be private and free from all pageantry—a desire which Caroline had then no inclination to oppose—it was arranged that none but Greville, Charles, Frederick, Dr. Hawtree, Major Palgrave, and Mr. Beaumont—Sir Arthur's solicitor—should follow; and on the morning appointed they met at the house, and were received by Caroline, in silence.

The hearse and coaches now arrived, and when all had been with an air of solemnity adjusted, they proceeded slowly towards the church, following a line of private carriages

The mourners were mourners indeed. All had esteemed him whom they followed as a faithful friend and an excellent man The ceremony, therefore, solemn them all, but more especially Caroline, who had loved him as a father, and wept during the service, considerably

Having thus performed the last sad offices and seen the remains of their departed friend deposited in the tomb, they returned to the house in mournful silence.

Caroline, on their return, was calm, and conversed with Dr. Hawtree on the subject of the ceremony with coldness and deference, while Lucrece most anxiously attended to Charles, who felt extremely weak and faint.

At length, when all had become composed, it was suggested by Mr. Beaumont—who appeared to be anxious to take leave—that the will of Sir Arthur should be read, and they accordingly moved slowly and as a mere matter of form to the table at which he was sitting

There was no anxiety, no eagerness manifested by either Caroline or any one present; they were all as tranquil as they could have been had they learned the will by rote, when Mr. Beaumont commenced

He had scarcely, however, finished the second sentence, when Caroline became alarmed, for she had got by rote that of which she was not aware, and therefore knew at once that this was not the same. Still she was silent, and Mr. Beaumont proceeded; and, as he did so, her breathing became quick and audible, and she trembled violently; for, by that will Sir Arthur had left, with the exception of a few trifling legacies, the whole of his property to Charles

"Well, sir, well!" exclaimed Caroline, scarcely able to articulate, "Read on, sir! read on"

"I have read the whole, Lady Cleveland," replied Beaumont.

"The whole! You have not mentioned my name!"

"It is not in the will"

"Give me the will" she cried, eagerly snatching it from him. "It is not" she added, having taken a hasty glance, while the parchment shook and rattled as she held it—"it is not. There has been fraud, villainous fraud, in getting it together, and fixing our eyes fiercely upon Beaumont. "there has been some foul play here—some trick, some forgery! This is not Sir Arthur's will"

"It is, as you perceive, duly signed and attested."

"His real will is that of which I have now a copy."

"And in which he forgets to mention your name"

"Yes! certainly!—that is the will"

"But that is a former will, Lady Cleveland. This is the last, and, of course, sets the other aside"

Her eyes now seemed ready to start from their sockets; and, having looked at Beaumont perceived for an instant a smile of triumph on Charles's face, she exclaimed

"Oh! you have succeeded well! to your heart's content you have succeeded! I knew your design. I knew that your purchased was to rob me! Villain! villain!"

"Caroline! dear Caroline! why so violent?" cried Lucrece.

"Violent! Look at that, and from this to your husband—the base wretch by whom it was procured—and then tell me why I should not be violent!"

"It was drawn up and signed," observed Charles, "long before my arrival."

"It is false! you know it to be false"

"Look at the date! satisfy yourself"

"I care nothing for the date! I see it all. Oh! was it not a measly act to reduce me thus to comparative beggary! But it was not done by you alone. No! This is the result of a foul conspiracy—a conspiracy in which even a father, who dare not speak to me, joined to effect the ruin of his own child"

"I!" cried Greville in amazement. "why this is monstrous."

"Oh! I cannot" said Caroline, wringing her hands.

"Talk not to me of wounded hearts. Look at the wounds inflicted upon mine I am injured! I alone! I am now the outcast—the destitute of everything. a beggar!"

"No, no! Dear sister. he calm—pray do."

"Away!"

"Nay, you shall hear: you cannot think that I have done aught, dear, to injure you."

"I know not that. I am justified now in suspecting all"

"Come, come! you shall hear me! I would not be misunderstood. Dear sister' view this matter with less passion. Be assured that you will be amply provided for. Charles will receive it from a competence—I know he will"

"Most valiantly!"

"What!" exclaimed Charles, his eyes flashing fire. "I've upon the bounty of him by whom I have been treated with contempt! Is that words indeed be a triumph—but a triumph of which he'll never have the power to boast"

"Boast!"

"Touch me not, Lucrece. Oh! you'll find me hard with all humility—you flatter yourselves then now I must But you are deceived. Robbed, insulted, denounced as I have been, I am not without resources"

"All here are friends," said Lucrece, as Caroline moved towards the door.

"All here are enemies—not friends—and as enemies I leave you."

"Dear sister! where would you go? Stay—stay—I implore you! Father! Frederick! do not let her leave

"Why stop me?" said Caroline, assuming a lofty air. "You can rob me of no more I have no more husbands for you to wheedle, deceive, and practise your deviish arts upon, dear;" she added, turning towards Lucrece, "you have got all now May it prove your bane!"

"Father! Frederick!" cried Lucrece, as Caroline quitted the room, "she is desperate—distracted."

"Do not be alarmed," said Fred, who, taking Lucrece with him, instantly followed, with the full determination not to leave her until she had recovered her calm.

"Well," said Greville, who had appeared to be thunderstruck throughout; "there's no accounting for the strange events of existence"

There's no mystery here," observed Charles "All can be accounted for easily. But," he added, turning to Greville, "I must beg of you, in the presence of Mr. Greville, to bear testimony to this, that until the will was duly produced, I had not the slightest knowledge of its existence."

"I have never expressed my lips on the subject," observed Dr Hawtree.

"Nor have I," said the Major

"And I never mean," rejoined, "you never heard of it from me"

"My dear boy" said Greville, "I am perfectly satisfied. Your word alone would have been sufficient for me. I was only observing how unaccountably things were ordered."

"Now" said Charles, "I will not detain you longer. I am much my self than I was accustomed when this will was made. We all know that his suspected Lady Cleveland of infidelity, and, I am satisfied, had reason to do so, though I cannot state my reasons for them. As a family believe her to be innocent of the crime of which she was then supposed to be guilty, and I am willing to forget the past. I have made overtures and proposed me before he expressed that belief to take care of her—the meaning of which them I could not understand—now either, rather to divide the property with her, or to secure to her during her life a certain annuity, as she may choose"

"I think," said Dr Hawtree, "that you had better defer the consideration of this matter for a time for her sake and your own. Let her"

"Decidedly," cried the Major "By doing so of that which you propose, you may ruin her for ever"

"I understand," said Greville, and I perfectly agree with you. Let things take their course"

At this moment Greville was summoned by Fred. Caroline would not remain in the house She had made up her mind to leave at once: she would go home with her father

"Nonsense!" cried Charles, when this had been explained "Induce her to remain, by all means"

"I can do nothing with her," said Fred. "She'll not listen to me"

"Well," replied Charles, "we must see what we can do." And taking Greville with him, he proceeded to the parlour in which she was standing dressed ready to leave

"Father, I wish to go home," said Caroline, haughtily, as they entered the room.

"Let me assure you, Caroline," said Charles, "that you cannot"

Caroline looked at him for a moment with a lofty expression of contempt, and then turning to Greville said "Father, are you ready?"

"Nay, my" said Charles, "you must entreat you to remain."

"Not another moment!" she replied; and seized Greville's arm with a force which made him stumble

"Well well, well well," said he, "don't be so violent! I'm going! But we haven't yet sent for a coach!"

"We can walk"

"No, no, we must have a coach 'I'll not go without a coach"

A coach was sent for, and Charles and Lucrece—who were again deeply afflicted, and who had been cruelly spurned by Caroline renewed their entreaties, begging of her earnestly to remain, if it were only for a time, but without any other effect than that of confirming her resolution

"I leave now!" she exclaimed, "and be assured I leave all. I'll not take a thing with me! I leave as I am"

The coach was then announced, and she left the house with Greville, fixing upon Charles a look of unutterable scorn.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

HONOURABLE TESTIMONIAL TO AN ENGLISH SEAMAN.—A letter has been sent by Baron Moncorvo, the Portuguese Ambassador, to Capt. Walsh, of the Conway, informing him, by the order of the Portuguese Ambassador, that his humane and philanthropic conduct in saving the crew of the Portuguese barque Carolina, on the island of Madeira, who were on the point of perishing at sea, had also received feelings of admiration and gratitude, and that, animated with those sentiments, some of the inhabitants had promoted a voluntary subscription, which had raised 105,240 reis, or 20l. 10s. sterling.

LOSS OF THE BARQUE FAIRFIELD AND SHIP ARKWRIGHT.—Communications from the Secretary of the Admiralty have been received by Lloyd's, which announce the loss of the barque Fairfield, Thomas Westlake, master, from Ancona, with a cargo of timber for her Majesty's dockyards, which was lost on the Kentish Knock, on the homeward voyage from the Gulf of Africa, on the 10th of September, when the master and crew were picked up by the Mackerel, Ipswich boy Christina, bound from the coast of Syria to Lisbon, where she arrived on the 29th ult.; and that the British ship Arkwright, of Liverpool, from Bahia, on the 6th of August, for London, was lost near Rio St. Francisco, when four of the hands were drowned.

THE TELEGRAPH BUBBLE.—An advertisement appears in the Journal du Havre, from M. Prevost, notary at Quillebœuf, requesting the shareholders of the company formed for the raising of the Telemaque. It states that "the works are now entirely finished, and that the cargo is lying on the quay at Quillebœuf. It consists of fifty two pieces of building timber, a considerable quantity of iron, and the machinery, which has been shipped on board the vessel and sailed. Up to the 23rd of September an immense quantity of sand remained on the vessel, but operations were being actively carried on, and the sand took a day or two after were sufficient to completely clean it all out. The most minute search was then made, and it was ascertained, beyond a chance of doubt, that the existence of treasure in the Telemaque was absolutely chimerical. Nothing now remains at present but the delivery of the shell of the vessel, which will shortly be sold by auction."

SHIPWRECK AT ANCONA.—On the Tuesday morning, the 12th inst., during a tempestuous gale from the N.N.E., the sloop Providence, Tupman, of Louth, from Scarborough for Shields, and the brig Lucknell, of and from Lynn, for Seaham, were driven ashore near this place. It being high water, the crews were saved without difficulty. The brig was a total wreck, but the sloop is expected to be got off

During the same morning the brig Amelia, Briggs, of Cowes, in ballast, from London to Middlesborough, and the schooner Curlew, Hull, of Whitby, from Dundi, also for Middlesborough, in ballast, from Blyth to Dundi. Both vessels were without masts, the former having a part of the schooner at the commencement of the gale, and carried away both masts of the schooner. The crew of the latter vessel while riding at anchor, by which she was enabled to ride a little longer. She finally parted from her anchors, and was most fortunately driven on shore, with the schooner, at high water, when the crews were saved by staying on board. Assistance was rendered by the coast guard service force. Providence, favourable, they will be got off. At the same time the brig William and Jane, Robson, of Sunderland, in ballast, from Blackpool to Sunderland, was driven ashore at Saltburn. The mate was unfortunately washed overboard and drowned; the rest of the crew saved themselves by keeping bodies on through the mast. Oct. 17th. During a tremendous gale from the E.N.E., a Prussian schooner in distress came under the rocks of Redcar. The Redcar life-boat was immediately got out to render assistance, but the vessel went over the rocks, and got safe into harbour.

SINKING OF THE BRITISH QUEEN STEAMER.—Last week, during the height of the storm, as the British Queen steamer was at the tail of the bank, on her passage across from Greenock to Helensburgh, it was found that she was making so much water as to render a continuance of its voyage dangerous; and she was immediately put about for Greenock harbour. As the passengers, together with the crew, were landed in safety, not in a moment or two after the vessel sank. The chief cause of the accident is supposed to have been the Greenock steamer, about a usual rate, which at minutes close by the breast of the quay opposite the harbour master's office; but though the casualty was felt at the moment of its occurrence, it was not reckoned so serious as to prevent her proceeding on her voyage, until a few minutes after leaving the quay.

LOSS.—On Monday last, a fine smack of about 50 tons, destined for the coasting trade, was launched from the building yard of Messrs Thomas and John White, ship-builders; she was named the "John Samuel," and was christened in due form, amid the presence of a number of spectators who had assembled on the occasion.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Since our last report the receipts of English wheat up to Mark-lane have been very moderate, owing to which, and the large attendance of country millers, the demand for that article has ruled steady, and the prices have advanced from 1s to 2s per quarter. Although there has not been a large business done in foreign wheat, the rates have had an upward tendency. Both barley and malt have sold freely at full quotations. The oat trade has been active, and the quotations may be considered 6d per quarter higher. Beans, peas, and flour have ruled about stationary

Arrivals.—English: Wheat, 2,650 quarters, Barley, 1,100; Malt, 3,080; and Oats, 1,060 quarters, Flour, 5,470 sacks Irish: Wheat, 3,110; Barley, ——; and Oats 6,730 quarters Foreign: Wheat, 2,770; Barley, 970; and Oats, 3,280 quarters.

FLOUR.—The large sales have been in progress this week, but they have passed of heavily, on rather easier terms.

Sugar.—For all kinds of sugar, both raw and refined, we have had a steady inquiry this week, and, in most instances, fully the prices of last week have been obtained.

Coffee.—The market was still a very firm appearance, and the quotations of most descriptions are the advance.

Cocoa. West India descriptions are commanding a firm inquiry, at fully previous figures.

Provisions.—In consequence of the cold weather, good Irish butter is selling briskly, at an advance of 1s to 2s per cwt. For the finest kinds of Belfast butter we have a steady inquiry, at 106s to 108s. Old bacon finds buyers at 52s to 54s, and sizeable produces 48s to 52s, landed Tallow.—The market is decidedly lower, yet we have no alteration in the quotations.

Tar &c.—The sales are on a very limited scale, yet hoders are firm, and demand 41s 9d. for P. V. C. on the spot.

Indigo.—The public sales have gone heavily, and prices are

Oils.—Cocoa Nut, Palm, and Whale Oils have undergone no alteration worthy of notice, and Cod, Linseed, and Rape continue to Hops.—Since our last report we have received the news from Yorkshire and Sussex, that the duration of the hop crop is now fully ascertained, and that the quantity is considerably less than was generally anticipated. The samples of fat stock have been large this week, the demand has been steady, at the following prices:—Inferior beef, from 2s 8d to 3s 10d; ditto, 4s 10d to 5s 4d; veal, 3s 4d to 4s 6d; and pork, 3s. to 4s per 8lbs., to sink the offal

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The much improved state of our finances has again had its influence in the money market. The increased receipts from the taxes have been unexpected, and consequently the improvement must be considered a most important one. The public credit has been favourable during the past month, for public and private credit has been raised considerably by the circumstance. The demand for money, for commercial purposes, is daily increasing, and yet restricted confidence does not render discount so difficult as it was during the late depression amongst the trading classes. Money, however abundant it still is, continues to advance in value, and the rates of interest are now nearly as high as they were previous to the panic. The present healthy state of the money market, and the ratification of the treaty of peace and commerce with New Granada are favourable circumstances for the extension of business in all the manufacturing and mining districts, the information received from them during the week containing, as it does in every respect satisfactory. The demand for cutlery and for hardware of every description, from the United States and from the East Indies would be here more active, and for iron in bars higher prices are obtained weekly. Distress, therefore, from every consideration, must soon cease in the manufacturing districts, and natural industry, all present transactions being for immediate use, and in no manner connected with speculation. On the English Exchanges the most pleasing circumstance since the failure of the Mexican Company has just been announced in favour of a further importation of the precious metals, and, with the exception of Mexico, the whole of the South American States are now particularly favourable. Indeed, Samuel Thrues advanced to 28 at the close of the week, and could not have been purchased under 28¾ when the week's transactions commenced.

The Halifax and North American royal mail steam packet the Caledonia arrived at Liverpool on the 16th instant, bringing her usual mails for that port, and the news from the United States is much more favourable than we have latterly been accustomed to. Commercial affairs were, at the beginning of this month, considerably depressed in that country, and it does not require to be stated that the credit of the Union would be improved by acknowledging the foreign debts, as it by paying the interest now so long over due. To the American bonds-men in Europe the information must be gratifying, as the public opinion must be favourable to payment.

On the Royal Exchange, during this week, the supply of commercial bills drawn on foreign countries has been considerably greater than for several previous weeks, and the terms charged on discounting bills of exchange Still this most necessary article continues to be abundant, and the distance must be so greatly improving, that on the English stock exchange rates experienced no alteration. Bank stock, at the close of the week, sold for money and for account about 200½, a corresponding improvement having also taken place in the value of our national securities. The reduction of the interest on the debt of the present year to 2½ per cent. Reduced, 101¾ Three-and-a-Half per Cent New 99¾; Long Annuities, 15¾; Bank of England Stock, 177; 3 per Cent. Last India Stock, 97¾ to 98¾; India Bonds, 98 to 99; Exchequer Bills, 64s to 66s per mum, London Joint Stock Bank, 12¾; London and Westminster Bank, 4¾; Union Bank of London, 10¾; Consols for account, 92¾.

FOREIGN AND RAILWAY SECURITIES.—Belgian Bonds, 103 to 103. Brazilian Bonds, 72¾ to 73¾. Buenos Ayres, 32 to 33. Chilian, 102 to 103. Columbian, 21¾ to 22¾. Danish, 103 to 104. Dutch 2½ per Cent. Certificates, 59¾ to 60. Ditto Twos, 39¾ to 40. Ditto Threes, 28¾ to 29. French Rents, 120¾ to 121. French Three per Cent., 82¾ to 83. Ditto, Russian Bonds, 116; Austrian Bonds, 114; Neapolitan Bonds, 106 to 107.

EMPLOYMENT.—Persons having a little time to spare, are reported that Agents continue to be appointed in London and Country Towns by the EAST INDIA TEA COMPANY, for the sale of their celebrated TEA (Office, 9, Great St. Helen's Bishopsgate-street within). They are packed in shares (twelve canisters from an ounce to a pound, with the prices and weight marked on each packet, and but little trouble is required in the sale. The Company is only 18 months old, and during the last seventeen years have realised considerable incomes by the Agency, without 1s. lost or loss. Application to be made (if by letter, post paid) as above.

REALLY WATERPROOF BERDOE'S WINTER VENETIAN WATERPROOF FROCK.—The stylish, ahd and gentlemanly garment has already been adopted by a long list of the nobility, gentry, professional gentlemen, &c., and will prove well deserving the attention of all who regard a respectable and gentlemanly appearance in opposition to slang, vulgarity, and meanness. Made to measure in the first style, but a large assortment always ready, of which an inspection is confidently invited. Warranted waterproof, and every perspiration.—Made only by W. BERDOE, tailor, waterproofer, &c., 69, Cornhill, (north side.)

DOVER.—LONDON HOTEL.—W. J. HOLLYER, begs most respectfully to inform the Nobility, Gentry, and Public in general, that he has entered into the above old-established House, which he has entirely refurnished and fitted up with every requisite for comfort and convenience. It is situated adjoining the Steampacket Quay, near the Railway Terminus, the Custom-House, and Admiralty Pier, and commands a fine view of the Harbour, Sea, and Castle. Families or Gentlemen boarded for any length of time, on terms that cannot fail to give satisfaction. W. J. H. begs to say that genteel accommodation and moderate charges, to merit the encouragement of the visitors to Dover and the Continent. Excellent Stabling. Lock-up Coach-houses.

ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, specially patronised by the QUEEN and the ROYAL FAMILY of FRANCE, and most of the several Courts of Europe. This Oil will produce and restore hair, prevent it from falling off or turning grey, free it from scurf and impurity, and be found a most effectual remedy and grower. It is unrivalled for children, as forming the basis of a beautiful head of hair.—Price 3s. 6d. and 7s. Fancy bottles (equal to four small), 10s. 6d.; and double that size, 21s. per bottle.

CAUTION.—The genuine article has the words "ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL," in two lines on the wrapper. All other are spurious imitations.

Sold at 20, Hatton-garden, and by Cacinists and Perfumers.

ELASTIC BOOTS.—THE QUEEN'S BOOTS.

J. SPARKES HALL'S PATENT ELASTIC ANKLE BOOTS require neither lacing, buttoning, nor tying: they can be put on and off in a moment, without trouble or loss of time. The constant annoyance of laces breaking, buttons coming off, holes wearing out, and many other evils attendant on the ordinary modes of fastening, suggested the improvement which is now submitted to the public. No boots ever afforded such variety of play and motion to the foot and ancles, or corresponded so exactly to their natural and anatomical form.—206, Regent-street, Langham-place, opposite the Polytechnic Institution.

Ladies and Gentlemen are advised to be fitted by forwarding a pattern boot.

ELEGANT CARDINALS at 12s. 9d.—BAILEY and Co beg to announce to the Public, that they have now on sale Waterproof Cardinals, lined with silk, and trimmed with Silk Bullion Fringe, 12s. THE PROPOSED NEW INFANTRY CAP.

This new pattern cap has been proposed for our infantry; but public opinion has been so unequivocally expressed against it, that it is not likely to prove a popular substitution for the cap now in wear. It is neither soldierlike nor appropriate; it bears a strong resemblance to the old Hessian infantry cap, which was introduced into the German service, but discontinued long before the Reformation. The cap is covered with black cloth, the crown and the brim being of black varnished leather; the band is of white worsted, as is the tuft, which is placed upon a ball of red worsted. Beneath is the royal crown, and underneath is a brass Maltese cross, in the centre of which is inscribed the number. On each side is a brass tuner's head, and inside is a small flap and spring; this contrivance being intended to serve as a ventilator in pu[illegible]

HARP FOR THE PRINCESS ROYAL.

Mr. A. Blazdell has just had the honour of presenting to her Majesty, at Windsor Castle, a small harp, made by him expressly for the Princess Royal, which has been highly approved of by the Queen.

The harp is three feet high; the pillar carved in pure Elizabethan taste, of white maple wood, and burnished gold; the base of pillar is carved, and supported by two dolphins; the body is also of maple wood, pure white; the front is enamelled and highly ornamented, from the design of Raphael; the neck has double gold lines, and bears the rose, thistle, and shamrock, in gold. The machine has action similar to that of large harps, which is considered peculiar for so small an instrument. The pedals, which are constructed with the machine, are of ivory, as are also the sides of the body and pegs. At the top of the pillar is a splendid crown, carved and burnished gilt. The cover for the harp is of white satin, richly embroidered, two wreaths of the rose, thistle, and shamrock, with P. R. in gold, and the whole is enclosed in a splendid mahogany case, highly polished. The strug box is also maple wood, inlaid with pearl, ivory tuning key, and in every respect is of the first workmanship. In tone, this small instrument is unusually powerful.

GRAND HARP MADE FOR THE QUEEN OF SPAIN.

Messrs. Collard and Collard, of Cheapside, have just completed two superb instruments for her Majesty the Queen of Spain, and the Infanta, of exit ordinary beauty and superior tone. The Duchess della Victoria, with Don[illegible] and suite, have been to inspect them, and were, in the highest degree, delighted with their many and various improvements and perfection, in richness, power, and extreme beauty of tone, lightness and elasticity of touch, and, in fact, in all the essential requisites of a fine pianoforte. Their compass embraces seven octaves, extending from A to A, and in this material feature, these instruments present a great difference from grand pianos in general, which are mostly confined to six octaves and a half, or C to F. The action is distinguished by the name of "repeater," by which term the peculiar mechanism of Messrs. Collard's instruments is so well known. The embellishments of the instruments are in the best taste. The cases are of British mottled oak; the sides are paneled with richly gilt carvings. The plinth is carved and gilt in the style of Louis Quatorze. Each instrument is supported on three elegant and massive trusses to correspond with the main ornaments. The lyre used for the pedal action tastefully conceals the wires which connect it with the interior mechanism. On opening the piano, the desk and candlestands display much fancy fretwork, and the keeping of the accompanying decorations. In fine, even the minutest detail of these magnificent instruments perfectly sustains the high reputation of the factory where they have been constructed.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, 17th Oct. 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—We are at present, as you may imagine, in a season little favourable for the exhibition of any very special novelty: the different changes of temperature succeed each other with such suddenness that it becomes exceedingly difficult to say what is required to meet them. It is, however, confidently expected that the cold will be extreme, in inverse proportion to the extraordinary heats that have predominated during the month of September; and that furs will come into immediate requisition, the more especially as it is well known that fur is one of those articles that offer to our fashionable artistes the most valuable resources for the exhibition of their elegance and taste. Thus we find the question of furs now everywhere agitated; and we have no doubt that we shall, in the approaching season, see them more used than ever, and, according to all appearances, with greater success than ever; not merely for muffs, but also as trimmings for robes in swansdown and in chinchulla, and for pelerines and camails in ermine, sable, fox, &c.

Of the various materials for dress we think we may point out as those most likely to be worn—mousselines de laine and cashmeres, the rich tissues of Smyrna, imperial rips, damask Pekins with satin stripes, Pekins of two shades, shots poults de soie, Persian Pekins with gold shades, African velvets with bizarre designs, and foulards figured with palms and branches of olive.

The forms into which these articles are thrown are as yet little seen; nor do I imagine that I can afford you much information on this point for some few days. Nevertheless I trust I shall be excused for describing two or three toilets, which at least appear to be in happy taste. The first of these was a morning robe for indoor use, and was made with a corsage having a falling collar, with an under stomacher of battiste, embroidered in light stripes; the skirt was open, displaying a second petticoat, trimmed with a deep flounce edged with lace. The other dresses were outdoor dresses, in bronze taffety and in pearl grey poult de soie, the first of which was ornamented upon the front of the skirt with a double turnback en biais, wide at the bottom of the petticoat, but remounting to a point towards the corsage, and bordered on each side by a frill of the same stuff; the corsage high, with a collar commencing from the point of the corsage and widening in the shape of a pelerine on the shoulder, closed with small buttons behind, and trimmed all round it by a gather of the same stuff; the sleeves were plain, round jockeys, rather wide, and trimmed with a frill. The second dress was trimmed with a flounce of the height of half the skirt, and surmounted with a frill, à la vielle, of the same material; the corsage was high, with three seams, all of them covered with a frill; the sleeves plain, with two rows of frills, forming jockeys.

The most fashionable hats are those of satin, couettishly developed with a full of blonde with long ends, as also hats of violet-coloured velvet, lined with uncut velvet, and trimmed with bouquets of marabouts, made short and tufted.

I do not know that at the present moment I can give you anything else worth notice; and, indeed, from the uncertainty that at present reigns here, it is dangerous to say what the fashions really are. You may, however, in any event, rely upon being furnished with information as soon as any change occurs; and in the meantime adieu.

HENRIETTE DE B.

CITY OF LONDON ELECTION.

NOMINATION OF CANDIDATES.

The nomination of candidates for the honour of the seat in the representation of the city of London, rendered vacant by the death of the late Sir Matthew Wood, took place yesterday, at the Guildhall, in the presence of a vast assemblage of electors.

Twelve o'clock was the hour fixed for the commencement of business, but the doors of the Guildhall were opened shortly before eleven o'clock, when the Livery were admitted, and began to take up their stations in the hall. Before twelve it was half filled, and, at the commencement of the business, was more than two-thirds occupied.]

Mr. Baring, with his mover and seconder, Mr. R. Ellice and Mr. Labouchere, arrived on the platform at a few minutes before the clock struck twelve, and took their position on the right side of the hustings, which were crowded with the partisans of the respective candidates.

A number of members of Parliament were present, and some of the most active and distinguished members of the Anti-Corn-law League. The members of the committees of both candidates were also present.

Mr. Pattison, in company with Mr. Jones Loyd, Mr. Travers, and the different members of his committee, arrived shortly afterwards.

The Sheriffs arrived at a few minutes after twelve, when proclamation was made, and the Queen's writ and the bribery act read.

Mr. Sheriff Musgrove called on the electors to give a patient and attentive hearing to all the gentlemen who might address them.

Mr. Prescott then came forward and proposed his friend Mr. James Pattison, as a fit and proper person to represent this City in Parliament. (Loud cheers.) He had known him so long, and so well, that he was able to assure them they would not be disappointed in him. (Cheers.) They knew him to be a merchant of the City of London, and a man of high character. His political principles were in accordance with his own, and he believed with the majority of the constituency. (Cheers and laughter.) He was a Liberal in politics, and a consistent supporter of the principles of free trade. He had always given his support to what was believed to be best for mankind. He was one whose word was as his bond, and whose actions had ever equalled his professions. (Cheers.)

Mr. Travers then came forward amid loud cheers to second the nomination, and after a brief but earnest eulogium on the character of the late Sir Matthew Wood, proceeded to say that Mr. Pattison had been invited to fill the vacancy in their representation, as the most fit and proper man in the City who could be found. He was the friend of order (uproar) and good government; the friend of all our free institutions, and the unflinching defender of all our popular rights. (Loud cheers.) They wanted a fit and proper man, and where could they find a more proper or more fit man than Mr. Pattison? (Cheers.) With Mr. Pattison's principles their interests were bound up. (Cheers.) Let them, therefore, return James Pattison, Esq., to Parliament, as the representative of free principles, and the advocate of the vital interest of this great country. (Loud cheers.)

Alderman Brown then came forward to propose Mr. Baring as a fit and proper person to represent the city of London in Parliament. His appearance was the signal for a tremendous uproar; and he long spoke in dumb show to all except those who were immediately around him. He said they could not find a better man than Mr. Baring. He had long been in a position to observe, and he knew well that no man was better fitted to be sent to Parliament than the English merchant; and of the character of the English merchant, they could not have a better sample than in the person of Mr Baring. The alderman then proceeded with much warmth, but in perfect dumb show, to denounce the tyranny of democracy, and the conduct of Mr. O'Connell, who, he said, was leading his fellow countrymen to destruction. (Great uproar.) They had done justice to Mr. Pattison on a former occasion he hoped they would imitate themselves on the present occasion. (Cheers, laughter, and uproar.) It was with the highest satisfaction he proposed to them Thomas Baring, Esq. (Great uproar.)

Mr. Russell Ellice seconded the nomination in two or three sentences, which were delivered in dumb show.

The Sheriff again came forward, and reminded the Livery of the request he had before made of them.

Mr. Pattison then came forward amid long-protracted cheering. He (Mr. Pattison) was the friend of free principles, who would vote for the repeal of the Corn-laws, who wanted cheap bread and cheap sugar. (Cheers.) A free trade in corn was the true basis of all commercial freedom. (Cheers.) And unless those principles were adopted the trade of this country must dwindle until it came to nought. (Loud cheers.) The cause of free trade was their cause and the cause of the people. He was reminded that to-morrow would be the anniversary of the battle of Trafalgar, and he would quote to them, he thought not inappropriately, the words of the immortal Nelson—"England expects that every man will do his duty." (Loud cheers, and cries of "We will, we will!")

Mr. Baring then came forward, amid the most tremendous uproar. He was inaudible to all who were not close to him. He said he could not be accused of presumption, for he had come forward in compliance with the wishes of a large body of the citizens of London. Let it not be concluded that a free trade was necessarily a fair trade, or a good trade. It had been said that he favoured protection for British interests. But he was not friendly to any protection which he did not believe calculated to secure the best interests of his fellow-countrymen. He said there was now a return of credit, confidence, and activity in the country, and would they risk these upon the mere assertion of free trade principles? The question now was, protection or no protection. While he was in favour of a fixed duty on corn, he thought that the benefits which might result from a fixed duty would be too dearly bought by exciting and alarming the country by an interference with the interest of the agriculture of the country. They were told that they were at issue on the point of free trade; there were other interests upon which he was at issue with Mr. Patison, but he should appeal to the poll to-morrow. If defeated, he should retire with no feelings of rancour towards his opponent; and if, on the other hand, he should be triumphant, he should go to Parliament their free representative, and not the factious opponent of any administration, but attempting to serve the best interests of his constituents and the country at large. (Cheers, hisses, and uproar.)

Sheriff Musgrove then came forward, took the show of hands, and declared, amid the most deafening cheers, that the Sheriffs were of opinion, that the show of hands was in favour of James Pattison, Esq.

He also announced that a poll had been demanded on behalf of both candidates, and that the polling would commence to-morrow (this morning), at eight o'clock, and close at four in the afternoon. (Cheers.)

Mr. Pattison and Mr. Baring then both quitted the Hall, each surrounded and cheered by his partisans, and hooted and yelled at by his opponents.

[Next week we shall give several illustrations of this exciting contest.]

ROYAL VISIT TO CAMBRIDGE.

We have repeatedly had occasion to express our highest approval of those royal excursions among the people by their Queen, which stimulate the loyalty of the one and freshen the love of the other, and cement between them, with beautiful links of harmony, the chain of happiness and the bonds of peace. The Sovereign who does not confine the gaieties of her court within a single palace, nor prison her pleasures within the selfish sphere of mere personal enjoyment but causes the first to shed their light over the hearts of thousands—and the last to be in the participation of her universal subjects, whenever the opportunity of careering joyfully among them may occur;—is sure to make her throne ubiquitous, by building it upon the firm foundation of the affections of those she rules—is sure to live in a kingdom of love, and earn a popularity of which it is both wise and virtuous in a monarch to be nobly ambitious and proud. But this is not all. Either,—as in the case of our beloved Queen's visit to the glorious old abodes of her ancient Scottish nobility—she awakens a lavish and honourable hospitality among the great, which causes money to flow freely among their tradesmen, and puts bread into the mouths of the poor—or, stirring the enthusiasm of loyal cities, encourages the spirit and the energies that are strong within them for purposes of public good. Or, as when she rode into stately London, and partook of the gorgeous festivities of its merchant princes—or, led by the hand of science, walked firmly beneath the waters of her own majestic Thames—she giveswise to a thousand new impulses of ambition in the heart of the very greatness to which she comes to lend a lustre and a crown she fosters fresh desires for monuments of grandeur in science and in art—and, as the lion of commerce crouches tenderly at her feet, her gentle and beautiful caress, her smiling approval, and her admiration, all confessed, make him long to leap forth upon his path of riches, and to roar of the might of his mistress in every quarter of the globe! Yes—the principle is even so good-abounding as all this—and what seems merely the casual excursion of a monarch, has in it—when that monarch is virtuous—a stimulus, not only for the living loyalty of the people—but for everything that is good or great—ay, or weak and struggling either—in the circle within which she moves. But if in all instances this familiar presence of a Queen among her subjects, be doing good—if her visits to renowned places strengthen the landmarks of history, and her presence at rare pageantries fix many memories which the future shall have of the past—so do all the advantages of such events and occasions, seem to concentrate themselves into that nobler and brighter excellence which all the universe derives from the royal encouragement of learning—from pilgrimages made to the temples and shrines of genius by the magnate rulers of the earth. It is, therefore, that we wish to mark our high sense of the judgment and good taste of our Sovereign in paying to one of our honoured universities that gracious visit, which is one of our prominent features of illustration in this day's News.

All along her route to the ancient colleges of Cambridge, her Majesty will have met with the usual tokens of the affection and enthusiasm of her people—their happy voices will have greeted her ear—their gay banners her sight, and she will have passed under their triumphal arches with pleasant feelings at her heart—feelings fresher than the flowers that were there entwined; but it is within the halls of learning themselves that her emotions will become more deep, and grave, and impressive—that, with the exalted pleasure which the imposing present will convey, she will see the hallowing past looking back to her from a thousand associations, and mingling its sacred instruction with the new thoughts and feelings that come rushing upon her heart. For the moment she is the living presence, whom, next to the highest, all men worship there. And what class of men are they? Reverend professors, who have stored their souls from books with imperishable and ever-flowing founts of knowledge—founts that have been poured through thousands of other minds;—young fathers of the Church, who have earned early knowledge, but are not rich, tutor others, richer, in much of the lore that they have gained—men to be encouraged, promoted, and respected whenever the world may become just; and, lastly, that dense crowd of earnest young aspirants—the ardent spirits of the place—the sons of her nobles, her clergy, her statesmen, her legislators, her warriors, her merchants—men whom she will often, under God's providence, see again in after life at her court, in her churches, at her council-board, among her lords and commons, at review, at levee, or civic feast; and by her presence all these are encouraged onward upon the paths of the knowledge which is to educate them for after life. Here the omens divinior imbibes its glory and its grace, and much is the spirit of its genius refreshed and rejoiced by the respect and patronage of her who rules the Isles. But Victoria, if she be regal-hearted, will gather still deeper inspiration for the honouring of those old abodes; and, above all, for promoting the beautiful purposes for which they were founded—from the echoes of history that be sounded from the ancient walls—the eternal voices of the past. The glorious halls will tell what regal munificence did for learning in ages not half so civilised as this. The portraits will be to her sense of true greatness and duty, more eloquent than the cheering living throng. The library will be full of thoughtfulness to her spirit, and in it she will linger more fondly than in the festive hall. Will she not read too that remarkable oration of her great predecessor, Elizabeth, which is so eloquent in its quaintness, and yet so quaint in its eloquence, and is, moreover, so full of wisdom's truth? It was first spoken in Latin, but it is so germane to the question we are discussing, and the doctrine we are laying down, that we shall give our readers an English version of it here. Thus spake the Queen:—

"Although this maiden modesty of mine, most faithful subjects and most cherished university, prevent me in presence of so numerous an assemblage of learned men from delivering my sentiments unlaboured on this occasion; nevertheless, the entreaties of my nobility and my own good will towards the university, induse me to offer a few observations. I feel myself impelled to this undertaking by two considerations. The first is the advancement of literature. The second is the expectation of all of you here present. As regards the advancement, I remember the particular remark of Demosthenes, that 'the words of superiors take the place of books with inferiors, and that the commands of princes have the authority of laws with their subjects.' This, therefore, I should wish you all to remember, that there is no more honourable path, whether to acquire the goods of fortune or to conciliate the favour of princes, than earnestly, as you have begun, so to persevere in attention to your studies; and that you may do so, I pray and beseech you all. With respect to the second consideration, namely, your expectation, which is not unnatural, this alone do I say, that I shall neglect nothing willingly which the feelings of your benevolent opinion conceive of me. And now I come to the university. I beheld before noon your magnificent buildings, erected by those renowned princes, my ancestors, for the cause of learning; and whilst I gazed upon them did sorrow take possession of my senses, and those feelings which asserted their influence over Alexander, when having read of many monuments left behind them by princes, he turned to a friend, or rather to one of his council, and grieved exceedingly that he had done nothing of the kind. This common remark, however, has comforted me in some measure, which, although it cannot take away, nevertheless diminishes my regret: which remark is this, that My time of life, however, is not so far advanced, nor have I lived so long since when I commenced to reign, but that before my payment of the debt of nature if destiny shall not have cut my thread of life too soon, I shall produce some work; and so long as life rules this mortal frame, I shall never turn aside from my purpose. And if it should come to pass (how soon it may be I know not), that I must die before I should be enabled to complete this particular one which I promise, I shall, nevertheless, leave after my death some work of worth by which my memory may become renowned in after time, and by my example I may excite others, as well as cause you all here present to be more arduous in your studies. But already you perceive how great a difference there is between a regular course of study, and that education which is not retained on the mind. Of the one, there are full many ample witnesses; of the other, I have too luminously indeed made you the witnesses also on this occasion in detaining your learned attention so long by my uncultivated style of address. I have done."

'Rome was not built in a day.'

The allusions here made by Elizabeth to the greatness and value of public works not only intrinsic—but in fixing the memories of those who reign when such pillars of genius and civilization are erected—may fall in the sense of compliment upon the ears of our young sovereign, whose sway among us is likely to be distinguished by the raising of more public structures of beauty and grandeur than ever recorded the elevated taste of a sovereign in any former time.

But these monuments are no whit more honourable to a sovereign than a patronage of the progress of learning—for learning should go hand in hand with art—and therefore we should hardly more congratulate her Majesty upon the completion of her magnificent Houses of Parliament, or of her City Temple of Trade, more than we now do for that noble spirit which has honoured the wisdom of our Universities, and dictated this regal visit to the olden glories of the Cam.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 We beg to remind our subscribers, who may not have obtained our Supplement of October 14, containing the Population Returns of England and Wales, according to the recent census, of the great value of this document as a work of reference. From all parts we have received letters expressing the satisfaction of the public at the valuable details and voluminous statements it contains; and we have, therefore, no hesitation in recommending it to our subscribers generally as a highly useful work, and which will, we have no doubt, on inspection, bear out the favourable opinion we have expressed. Copies continue to be sold by all booksellers and newsmen, or may be had direct from our office by an order addressed to our publisher, Mr. W. Little, 198, Strand. This supplement will be found a useful work for reference when bound up with our half-yearly volume, and we recommend our subscribers to preserve it for that purpose.

CENSUS SUPPLEMENT. Errata: page 3—Ashington, Sussex, pop. 382, should be 982; page 13—Stopham, Sussex, should be Stopham; page 15—Wyatsfi, Cumberland, should be Wyton, Cumberland, pop. 9635. The following parishes were omitted in their proper place:—Oulton, Suffolk, pop. 660; Parham, Sussex, pop. 58; Swimbridge, Devon, pop. 1746; Redmarley, Worcester, pop. 981. Any errors or omissions will continue to be noticed, and we shall feel extremely obliged to any correspondent for such communication.

"J. M."—Wigton will observe we have attended to his corrections. Our correspondent adds—"Your Census Supplement ought to be in the hands of every postmaster, and you would do well to recommend it to them, as letters are frequently put into an office addressed to villages in another county without the nearest post town being given.

W. T. S., Storrington.—Thanks for his letter. The parish of Cold Waltham will be found at page 14, under the name, Cold.

T. E.—Chester.—The parish of Cooperale, or Thoydon-Garnon, will be found in our list, under the latter name.

"W. S. M." Lincoln.—The population of Lincoln City and Liberty is 18,172. The City, exclusive of the parishes forming the Liberty, contains 13,896 inhabitants. The population of the parishes returned in our list is 13,861; including the extra-parochial places, which contain 305 inhabitants.

A Cornishman.—The population of the borough of Truro, according to the last census, was 6901. Our list only contains parishes, cities, and towns. The returns of the population of all the boroughs in Great Britain, which we had not room for in our last Supplement, will appear with the Census of Scotland and Ireland, now in preparation, in the same form as that of England and Wales.

R. S., "Castle Douglas.—Stewmort Town, or Lower Mutton Chapelry, in the county of Worcester, is entered as Mutton, in our list; the population is 304.

T. C., Reading.—An elector can only vote for one candidate when one member is to be returned.

"A Subscriber," Dover.—The situation of landing-waiter in the Customs is a highly respectable one. We do not know the amount of salary attached to it.

"Amicus Verus."—The lamented gentleman resided for a time at Kentish-town.

"S. S."—Hoyle's Treatise on Backgammon.

"Winslow."—Thanks.

"J. W." Manchester.—We cannot avail ourselves of our correspondent's offer.

"A Looker-on," Birmingham.—We will inquire into it.

"A Constant Reader," Watford.—We know of no public fund where our correspondent can procure the loan.

"A Subscriber," Dover.—Mr. Thomas, Finch-lane, supplies the publication in question.

"A Poor Man," Nottingham.—Sevenpence is an overcharge, and our correspondent should change his newsman.

"W. H. P."—The time to Elizabeth are undetermined.

"Gwilym ab Prydda."—The objection to the route to Paris, via the London and Brighton Railway, is the long sea passage.

"X. Y."—See Census, with the population of every parish in England and Wales, price 6d.

"H. B.," Walderchare.—We will endeavour to carry out our correspondent's suggestion.

"J. R. W.," Cambridge, is thanked for his prompt intelligence of the royal visit to the university.

Clurvigue should refer to the Medical Times.

H. Duke.—The first name would be the legal one

"J. N. H." Sheffield.—We think worthy of consideration the suggestion of our correspondent, that some plan should be adopted to avoid the confusion of the same, so that all may not alike be strangers to the business. The Census can be ordered of any newsman.

"A Constant Reader."—The national schools are entirely under the superintendence of members of the Church of England. The British and Foreign School Society profess to teach children of all religious denominations.

M. B., Clapham Common.—Thanks.

"A. B.," Quarist.—The first syllable is accented.

"A Constant Reader," Wootton-under-Edge, should send us a few anecdotes of his own experience.

"W. Martin," Rugby, is thanked for his impromptu.

"City Election."—In our memoir of Mr. Pattison it was erroneously stated that he lost his election, for he was not defeated, but whereas he was then returned with Sir M. Wood and Messrs. Grote and Crawford.

"An Old Subscriber," Oakley-square.—Queen Victoria was born at Kensington-Palace, May 24, 1819.

"C. W.," Albany-street.—At present we must decline

"M. C." should inquire at any musicsellers.

"Lancer," Maidstone.—We cannot decide the wager.

"Rev. S. D.," Warwick.—The table would be valuable, but not generally interesting.

"An Adherent.—Corporal Trim."—A person born in a prison does not thereby enjoy any privileges or exemptions.

"H. E.," Norfolk.—All villages which are not returned as Parishes are omitted in our Census Return, which alluded to parishes, chapelries, and towns.

In reply to several Census correspondents, why the population of the parishes in cities and towns, when added together, do not amount to the population quoted for such towns, we have to explain, that many parishes are situate partly within and partly without the boundary of the towns. Our return for parishes gives the entire population of each; and for cities and towns only the population of such part of the parishes as form the town, including that of extra parochial places, if any.

ROYAL VISIT TO CAMBRIDGE.—Next week we shall conclude our illustrations of the Royal visit to the University of Cambridge with a series of highly interesting views of the colleges and public buildings visited by her Majesty, receiving on the magnificent occasion, &c. &c. By extraordinary exertion we are this week enabled to present our readers with the early scenes of the royal visit; and next week we shall, still more attractively, complete our illustrated record of this very important event.

Books received.—Sir Cosmo Digby; by J. A. St. John, Esq.; 3 vols. Tales of the Colonies; 3 vols. Conversations on Arithmetic. Book of the Months. Etiquette of Courtship and Marriage.

CHESS.—"K. B. P." will see that his wishes have been attended to.

C. V., Dublin.—In the 39th and 40th problems the board was misplaced, the white square should be at the right hand corne

Novice.—Of course the king can take the rook, unless by so doing he would go into check by some other piece.

"S. C.—Hull."—We cannot give any further explanation than the one we give week after week:—a pawn, on reaching the eighth square, can be exchanged for a queen or any other piece you wish; thus you can have two or more queens, three or more rooks, &c., on the board at one time. To the other question we must say again, stalemate is a drawn game.

Solutions to problem No 42 received from "Chirurgus," "Dean Forest," "Checkmate," and "Clericus;" and to No. 41 from "Adurnensis" and "G M."

"A Chess Player" is desirous of playing a game or two by correspondence; address C. C., Brighton, Sussex.

'Edward' will be glad to hear from "J F C."

 We have great pleasure in stating to our subscribers that our new machines have enabled us to report and illustrate the Queen's visit to Cambridge up to a much later hour than we could otherwise have done without this improved mechanical aid. We shall shortly present our readers with an engraving and description of the machines.

 Next week we shall present to our readers, with other illustrations, a grand panoramic view of Cambridge, with the procession of the royal visit; this view will include all the most celebrated public buildings of this ancient city, and will occupy one full page of our journal.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1843

Every day brings its record of teeming poverty, and every morning's Journal presents some new phase of helpless suffering, as well as, unfortunately, some fresh instance of official neglect and hardheartedness. It would seem, that the continual contact with misery, and the daily habit of hearing the piteous plaint of distress and pain, ossifies human sympathies to such a degree, that the men of all others who ought to be considerate and humane towards the poor, and are installed in offices, the ostensible duty of which is to relieve them, are men remarkably and stoically insensible to their wants, and deaf to their entreaties. A thorough-paced Poor-law official considers his first duty to be to guard as effectually as possible the poor-rate revenues from the assaults of the clamorous and unfortunate poor; and every penny saved from the gripe of wretchedness is, in his opinion, an addition to the common weal, and the trophy of a laudable vigilance. Far from wishing that several unworthy applicants should be relieved more than one deserving sufferer should perish, he adopts the sentiment and the rule, and would exclude those whose tale of sorrow is true and whose suffering is unaffected, rather than one impostor or unreasonably querulous applicant should be admitted to taste the sweets of workhouse luxury. He acts with the precipitate caution of a besieged warrior, who would close the gates of his citadel against his friends, lest he should admit an enemy. To this disposition on their part are attributable those melancholy exhibitions before our police courts, which excite the astonishment and harrow the feelings of all, save the parties against whom despairing misery makes its appeal. The sympathy of every one else is awakened, and the tear of the sorrow-stricken pauper does not fall unheeded as far as the rest of the world is concerned; but the sturdy personification of the New Poor-law is unmoved, except it be by an emotion of surprise at the clamorous insolence that makes such an outcry about perishing.

The most frequent form of official callousness is manifested to the public in the reckless rejection, or bandying about of paupers like shuttlecocks, from one workhouse to the other. Some wretch, in the last stage of starvation or disease, applies for relief at the workhouse; a question arises as to the parish in which he has a legal settlement; he is refused admittance, and sent to another parish, where his claim to relief is on the same ground disputed, and until the question of settlement, one involving in many cases as many points of minute investigation as the material of a Chancery suit, has been disposed of—until official doggedness, recrimination, and perverseness, has been exhausted the miserable victim of the unfeeling squabble is left to endure, hopeless and heartsick, the pangs of pain and hunger. The sinking of a debilitated constitution, will, forsooth, be stayed, and the worn-out frame checked in the progress of decadence, pending rejoinders and rebutters, between St. James's and St. Giles's. The abuse to which we have alluded, is a monstrous and an odious one. It were better that the law of settlement should be altogether abolished, than that it should give opportunity for such flagrant brutality.

Several instances of extraordinary heartlessness, not referable to the foregoing class, on the part of beadles, overseers, &c., occasionally arrest public attention. We notice, in a morning paper of Monday last, the application of a poor woman, named Mary Parkes, to Mr. Norton, the sitting magistrate at Lambeth Police Court. It appears that she had been turned out of Whitechapel workhouse, for not consenting to be passed over to Ireland; her reason for refusal being, that she was suffering a painful illness, and was incapable of enduring the voyage. A medical person, not the parish doctor, was sent for by Mr. Norton, and he confirmed her statement as to her unfitness to undergo the hardships of passage from Liverpool to Ireland. The woman, in addition, complained that her illness was aggravated by being obliged to get out of bed at six o'clock in the morning, and remain until seven, in a cold yard, before she went to chapel, also of the want of adequate nourishment, the indifference of the matron, &c. The vigilance of the Board of Guardians should be the natural preventive of instances of this kind; and, when not successful in preventing, it should be exerted to punish. The Poor law is sufficiently harsh in its provisions, and a harsh law requires considerate administration. A deep responsibility rests on those who undertake duties in connection with it, and omit to guard, not only against its too rigorous enforcement, but also against the exercise of cruelty and rigour overstepping its enactments.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—This morning her Majesty and Prince Albert, the Prince and Princess of Hohenlohe Langenbourg, the Lord and the Lady in Waiting, and the Equerries in Waiting on her Majesty and his Royal Highness, attended divine service in the Royal Lodge Chapel in the Great Park. The Rev. Mr. Conisbeey officiated, and took his text from Matthew, chap. xvii., and the first, second, and third verses. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay performed divine service in the private chapel to the Royal Household. Her Majesty and Prince Albert took their accustomed morning walk. The Earl and Countess of Errol and the Hon. Mrs. Chas. Grey arrived at the Castle on Saturday evening on a visit to the Queen.

MONDAY.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert took their usual walking exercise, and the Princess of Hohenlohe Langenbourg visited the Duches of Kent at Frogmore. The Earl and Countess of Errol, Lord and Lady Lyttelton, and Mr. R. Ormsby Gore took their departure from the Castle; and the Earl and Countess of Orkney, the Earl and Countess of Rosslyn, Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston, Lady Granville, Lord Granville Somerset, Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, Sir Henry Wheatley, and Captain Francis Seymour, arrived on a visit to her Majesty.

TUESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert took their usual morning walk within the precincts of the Castle. The royal family were also taken their accustomed airings. The Earl and Countess of Orkney and Lady Granville took leave in the forenoon. Sir Henry Wheatley and Captain Francis Seymour also took their departure from the Castle. In the afternoon the Queen and a large party of the noble and illustrious visitors, and the royal suite, left the Castle for a drive in the park. The Queen and the Princess of Hohenlohe Langenbourg were in a pony carriage. The Countess of Rosslyn, the Viscountess Palmerston, the Hon. Miss Stanley, and the Earl of Warwick occupied another carriage. Prince Albert and the Prime of Hohenlohe Langenbourg rode on horseback, accompanied by the Earl of Rosslyn, Viscount Palmerston, and Lord Granville Somerset. The Equerries in Waiting, the Col. Commanding the Royal Horse, attended her Majesty and his Royal Highness on horseback. The Countess of Mount Edgecumbe arrived, and succeeded the Countess of Charlemont as the Lady in Waiting on the Queen. Miss Rass had the honour of waiting on her Majesty with the portraits of the Prince and Princess of Hohenlohe, painted by Sir W. C. Ross, R.A., of which her Majesty and his Royal Highness were pleased to express their approbation.

WEDNESDAY.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert set out on their journey to Cambridge, a description of which will be found elsewhere. The Chancellor of the Exchequer arrived at Windsor on Tuesday evening from his seat Betchworth, Surrey. The Postmaster-General had an interview with the Right Hon. Gentleman at his official residence in Downing-street.

THE GRAND DUKE MICHAEL OF RUSSIA.—His Imperial Highness has been staying a round of visits to a number of the most distinguished nobility since his departure from Edinburgh. On Saturday morning the Grand Duke arrived at Drayton Manor, the residence of Sir Robert Peel, from Chatsworth, after a visit to the Duke of Devonshire. On Sunday his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael of Russia accompanied his host and Lady Peel to Tamworth to attend divine service at the ancient church of that town. His Imperial Highness and the visitors to Sir Robert and Lady Peel at the Manor were confined within doors all the afternoon, in consequence of the exceedingly unfavourable weather that prevailed. On Monday the Grand Duke took a cordial farewell of the right honourable baronet and Lady Peel, whom he thanked for the hospitality with which he had been received, and then took leave of Sir George Murray, Sir H. Hardinge, and the other guests at the Manor, and departed for Willey, on a visit to the Queen Dowager.

VISITORS TO HER MAJESTY.—The Queen will entertain a succession of distinguished guests at Windsor Castle during the ensuing week. His Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael of Russia is expected to arrive at Windsor, upon a visit to her Majesty, on Monday next.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—On Wednesday, at the hour of eleven, a.m., the Right Hon. Edward Ellice, M.P. for Coventry, led to the altar at St. George's Church, Hanover-square, Anne, Dowager Countess of Leicester, eldest daughter of the Earl of Albemarle, and relict of the late Earl of Leicester. The ceremony was performed in the presence of the Earl of Leicester, Viscount Bury, the Hon Colonel George Keppel, the Hon. Edward Wentworth Coke, Scots Fusilier Guards; Lady Margaret Wenman Coke (only daughter of the noble bride), and other branches of the family

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester arrived at Gloucester House on Wednesday evening, from a visit to her Majesty the Queen Dowager, at Witley Court, Worcestershire

Mr. W. H. Holmes, pianist, had the honour of performing before her Majesty the Queen Dowager, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, and a large party of the nobility and gentry, at Witley Court, on Saturday last.

THE LATE SIR JAMES SHAW, BART.—This venerable baronet is succeeded in his title by his nephew, John (Low Sir John Shaw), son of John Macfie, of Greenhalton, Ayrshire, by the sister of the late baronet. He assumed the name of Shaw in 1815, in lieu of his patronymic Macfie

Lord Brougham arrived, on Tuesday evening, in Grafton-street, from Broughamhall. His lordship paid some visits in that locality on his route to town, from the north. Lady Brougham is still at Cowes, Isle of Wight.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Hon. Mr. Law (Recorder of London) left town on Tuesday by the halfpast 9 o'clock train of the South Eastern Railway for Cambridge in order to be in attendance when Her Majesty arrives at that ancient seat of learning, the right hon. and learned gentlemen being the representative in Parliament for the University.

The Morning Post states, upon authority, that her Most Gracious Majesty, and her Majesty the Queen Dowager have discontinued their private boxes at Covent Garden Theatre, in consequence of the meetings of the Anti Corn Law League being held therein.

The death of Mr. Wyndham, the conservative member for Salisbury, occasions a vacancy in the representation of that city. Mr. Bouverie, second son of Lord Radnor, is named as a probable candidate.

Sir G. B Hamilton, Secretary of Legation at Berlin, has had his leave extended, and leaves town for the north on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, at Dalkeith.

Mr. Dean, Chairman of the Customs, had an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Tuesday, at his official residence in Downing-street

M. Araujo Ribiero, on a special message from the Emperor of the Brazils, and Count de Chabot, French Chargé d'Affaires, transacted business same day at the Foreign-office.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

RAILWAY EXTENSION.—A meeting of the proprietors of the Northern and Eastern and Eastern Counties Railways was held on Wednesday last, at which an amalgamation of their mutual interests was agreed on. A resolution was passed empowering the directors to extend the northern and eastern line from Newport to Cambridge

THE NELSON MONUMENT IN TRAFALGAR-SQUARE.—The statue of Lord Nelson is now being exhibited gratuitously to the public in Trafalgar-square, with the hope that visiters may be induced to aid the subscription which is being collected for an entertainment to be given to the Greenwich pensioners in Trafalgar-square, on the anniversary of the battle of Trafalgar, April 2nd, 1844.

PARISH OF ST. STEPHEN'S, WALBROOK.—We regret to see that this parish continues to be painfully agitated in consequence of Alderman Gibbs, the perpetual churchwarden, withholding the parish books from the open scrutiny. Mr. Gibbs will only consent to produce his accounts to the select vestry, to whom he says he is altogether amenable. In this state of things we think that the select vestry are quite the party much bound as either the rest of the parish to bring the matter to an amicable conclusion. An open vestry was held on Thursday, by which several very pungent resolutions were adopted

ALARMING ILLNESS OF MR. W. FARREN.—This admirable comedian has been seized with a sudden and dreadful visitation of Providence, that threatens in its consequences to deprive the stage of one of its greatest ornaments. On Tuesday night, when near the conclusion of Mr. Lemon's new drama of "Old Parr," at the Haymarket theatre, he was observed to exhibit an unusual tremor of manner, and sank on the chair used in the scene. The curtain fell at the usual time, and it was then discovered that he had been attacked with a fit of paralysis, and was unable to speak. He was instantly conveyed to his room, and medical assistance sent for. During the few minutes that elapsed before the arrival of the surgeons, Mr. Webster had caused to be applied some remedies that appeared likely to be efficacious at such an alarming crisis. Mr. Cooper and Mr. White arrived immediately afterwards, when it was discovered that his side and arm were completely stricken. He was conveyed home in a state of stupefaction, and attended by the most eminent members of the faculty. On inquiry on Wednesday evening, it was found that the violence of the attack had not abated, he side and arm having been entirely paralyzed. This is the third attack of the same malady, but the first that has left behind such fearful consequences, the two previous ones having only confined him to his chamber for a few days. Mr. Farren's habits of living have ever been regulated with the most rigid regard to his health, and he has for many years walked from his house, at Brompton, to his duties at the theatre, returning home to dine at the same hour; and this evening he was in the most fervent mood whether or not when returning home at the end of the performance.—(We are truly happy that the above was not Mr Farren's Illness, which we copy from the morning papers, is greatly exaggerated

UNHEALTHFULNESS OF PARTS OF THE METROPOLIS.—The neighbourhood of Temple-bar, and its western courts and alleys, are at present an unhappy illustration of the fact, that closely-built houses, densely populated by the indigent or poorer classes, are dreadful sources of disease and contagion. This unhealthy spot, during the last twelve months, has forcibly attracted the attention of the parochial authorities, whose duty it is to prevent the patients in their shades of filth, destitution, and disease. Many of the houses are here let out in separate apartments to as many families, where they cook, wash, and sleep, in a confined space scarcely to be credited, even by their landlords living away from the premises. Consequently, from an accumulation of filth and concomitant causes, fevers are ever prevalent. Last week a family, suffering with typhus, were removed to the Fever Hospital, the husband and wife died, but were brought back in shells to their former domicile, where they were deposited in the attics, and there still remain. In another house, in Slup-yard, an unhappy woman expired on Friday of typhus fever, and up to the present time the last offices of humanity having been performed. In short, similar cases are unhappily of frequent occurrence

DISGRACEFUL PROCEEDINGS IN A CHURCHYARD.—On Tuesday at three o'clock, the body of Mr. Jacob Burns, aged 74, was carried to Portugal-street grave-yard for interment. The coffin, instead of being lowered into the grave, according to custom, was left at the side of the burial service. As soon as the clergyman retired, the grave-diggers attempted to force the coffin into a hole (for it could not be called a grave) that was prepared for its reception. They were forcing the coffin into the hole by main force, and with the aid of heavy logs, when the children and friends of the deceased exclaimed bitterly against their proceedings. The gravediggers continued to drive down the coffin, when the assembled multitude declared that they would not see such an outrage. The eldest daughter then advanced to the edge of the grave, and with tears in her eyes implored the gravediggers not to insult the remains of her father, who for twenty-five years resided in a house in the churchyard, and the general cry was "Dismiss the body." Altength Mr. Wood, the senior churchwarden, accompanied by other parochial officers, entered the churchyard at the moment that the people evinced every disposition to resort to violence. Mr. Wood addressed them in kind terms, and implored of them to be quiet, and promised that everything that was proper should be done. Mr. Wood immediately ordered the grave to be re-opened. An attempt was made to get fresh ground for the corpse, but, although the gravediggers bored four different places, they could not find space for a new grave, in consequence of the crowded state of the churchyard. The churchwardens inquired the relatives and friends of the deceased if they would allow the old grave to be covered up for the night, promising that Mr. Burns's remains would be decently interred on Wednesday morning in a new grave. As night was approaching, the parties took the old grave-warden's promise, and left the ground, having first seen the old grave covered in for the night. On Wednesday the body was disinterred, according to the churchwardens promise, and deposited in a new grave. A person who measured the new grave stated that it was not more than one foot eight inches.

IMPROVED COMMUNICATION WITH IRELAND.—Captain Beck and Captain Parr, in the employ to the Secretary of the Admiralty, announce "that they have proceeded to Holyhead and Port Dynllaen" to examine "these harbours on the spot with reference to their capability and position, for the purpose of ascertaining which, if either or both, is the most eligible to establish as the port of communication with Dublin for the packets," &c. They state that they have accordingly examined those places by land and sea, and without bias of any kind from local interests or otherwise, but having regard solely to the quickest transit consistent with safety from one side of the channel to the other, it is their unqualified opinion, that, both as to capability and position, Holyhead is, unquestionably, the most eligible harbour on the coast as a port of communication with Dublin Mr. Walker, the celebrated engineer, fully coincides in this opinion, and when the railway from Chester to Holyhead is completed, the mail will be transmitted from the one square, London, to the Post-office, Dublin, in fourteen hours.

HIGH TIDE IN THE THAMES.—There was an unusually high tide on Wednesday morning; in the afternoon the tide came up with great velocity, and at one time the river overflowed its banks, and rushing over the wharfs and embankments above and below bridge, did considerable mischief. The lower parts of the houses in Greenwich, Woolwich, Blackwall, Shadwell, Wapping, and Rotherhithe, were invaded by the flood, the streets for some time were rendered impassable, and the sewers choked up. The High-street, Wapping, presented the appearance of a canal, and for a short time all communication with the tunnel was cut off, and many persons coming from the West-end embarked in small boats at Wapping Old-stairs and Union stairs, and crossed the river, entering the tunnel at the Rotherhithe side. The water was within a few inches of the top of the tunnel-arch at Rotherhithe into the street, and fears being entertained that it would enter the shaft and fill the tunnel, strong bodies were ordered to keep it. Either Thames out of its bounds, or the river overflowed its banks, and when it was impossible to proceed to Greenwich. Great sufferers have been sustained by Mr. Blackwall, a grocer, in Wapping High-street, and also by Mrs. Wenman, the Woolpack Arms, Wapping Old-stairs. Mr. Allen, of the Ship Arms, Mr. Johnson, of the Ship Tavern, at Execution-dock, at both of whose houses constables, whose cellars were overflowed, and their stock of spirits, ale, and beer wasted. It is singular that the owners of water-side property have taken so little pains to guard against these periodical inundations, which are always to be expected at this season of the year. The embankments of the Thames are very defective, and little has been done to prevent the footpaths of the tide; while many persons continually stow away perishable goods and property of every description in underground cellars and warehouses below high water mark, and when there is an extraordinary high tide, every article is set afloat in those places, and people often ruined for the want of a little caution and foresight.

PORTSMOUTH DOCKYARD.—An order was received at this dockyard on Tuesday, to send a clerk to Woolwich, to receive instructions in the new system recently adopted there of admitting workmen in and out of the establishment. In compliance with this order, Mr Penfold, second clerk in call office, proceeded to Woolwich on Thursday morning. It appears that at Woolwich dockyard there are about 800 workmen, and in this dockyard about 2,200. At Woolwich the workmen are admitted with tickets, which serve as a check on their time; and the plan is there considered to work well, the system of calling the men being established. It is calculated that this plan effects a saving of half an hour in the time of each workman. It is not quite certain whether this system would be found practicable when applied to so many as 2,200 men; but if it should be put in operation successfully, it will effect a saving of the pay of 100 men daily—a consideration, it will be generally admitted, of no trifling importance.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD.—A convocation will be held on Monday next, at twelve o'clock, for the purpose of electing a successor to Dr. Hampden, Bishop of Hereford, in the place of the Rev. H. Heming, M.A., resigned. The election of a Vinerian Professor of Common Law in the room of the late Dr. Williams, is fixed to take place in convocation on Tuesday, the 7th of November, at twelve o'clock.

LLANDAFF CATHEDRAL.—The Rev. W. Knight Bruce, M.A., Chancellor of Llandaff, has issued an appeal to the clergy for subscriptions for the restoration of the Cathedral Church of the diocese. The beautiful structure in several parts in a dilapidated condition, and many of its principal beauties have been entirely destroyed. The Dean and Chapter have subscribed £1000; two laymen have contributed £100 each, and her Majesty the Queen Dowager, with her accustomed liberality, has sent the committee a donation of 100 guineas

THE IRISH CHURCH.—It is stated that an official gentleman, employed by Sir Robert Peel for the purpose, has been, for nearly the last six months past, engaged preparing a statement of the revenues of the Irish church establishment, arranged in a tabular form, embracing each individual parish, and specifying the income of the incumbent, the number of Protestant parishioners, the number of Roman Catholics [illegible] the bishops, and the deans and chapters, is also to be specified. Those returns are to be completed previous to the next session of Parliament.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BIRMINGHAM.—The present alarming condition of Ireland has been productive of a good deal of excitement in Birmingham. A requisition signed by twenty-nine town councillors, and a thousand other householders, manufacturers, and others was presented to the mayor, requesting him to convene a meeting to consider the propriety of praying the Queen that she would not allow the army and money of the country to be supplied from the Government for the purpose of coercing Ireland. The Mayor refused to accede to this requisition, and the meeting was then held without his co-operation at the People's Hall, Shadwell-street. Mr. Alderman Weston presided. After a number of speeches had been delivered, an address to her Majesty was adopted, which concluded by praying her Majesty to "dismiss from her councils those ministers by whose rash proceedings not only had the lives of thousands been put in jeopardy, and sacred rights invaded, but the prerogatives of the Crown and the liberties of the whole British people have been endangered.

BRIGHTON.—"BEWARE OF PICKPOCKETS."—This memorable exhortation from the pulpit of the Chapel Royal, at Brighton, will not easily be forgotten, and a circumstance has recently occurred in that fashionable watering place calculated to revive the recollection of that remarkable affair. On Sunday last a lady, on leaving St. Margaret's church, after morning service, found herself minus her purse and 15 sovereigns. Another lady also lost her purse containing two sovereigns; and we understand that a gentleman had his pocket-book extracted from his pocket, but, fortunately, there was nothing of value in it.

KENT AUTUMNAL FIRE AT SHOOTER'S-HILL.—On Tuesday afternoon a fire was discovered in the rick-yard of Kidbrook farm, the property of Mr. Coatsworth, situated about a quarter of a mile east of Morden College. A woman attached to the farm gave the alarm. She saw two lads running away, who, it was afterwards ascertained, had been firing at some birds, and the wadding had set fire to a wheat stack. An express was sent off to the Greenwich police-station, and a strong body of police of the R division was despatched to the spot, and were met by Mr. Inspector Palmer and a body of police from Lee. There was a plentiful supply of water in a pond, but, unfortunately, the length of hose was not sufficient to reach it, and the water had to be conveyed in buckets. Engines were soon on the spot, and the flames were kept in check. At that time three wheat stacks were in one blaze, and adjacent were others, the produce, with hay, of 600 acres of land. Attention was then directed to the other stacks, by covering them with tarpaulins, and throwing a deluge of water upon them. At twenty minutes past five an engine arrived from Southwark bridge-road, speedily followed by others, which were promptly put in use, and all fear was removed of the extension of the fire. The loss was roughly calculated at £350.

KINGSTON.—The quiet town of Kingston, Surrey, has been for three weeks past in a state of extreme excitement, owing to the discovery of two robberies, the first in most extensive scale, the large malthouses in Kingston, the property of Messrs. Charles Frederick and Morris Ashby, brewers, of Staines; the other on the premises of Mr. Nightingale, maltster, of which Mr. Ashby's premises, and which involving of a great stock in trade, and the number of persons employed in it, the Court of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, applied for a summons against Mr. Alderman Gibbs, as churchwarden of the above parish, for refusing to allow Mr. W. Frederick Ashby to inspect the Alderman's books. The Lord Mayor: "On what authority do you ground your application?—Mr. Crosbie: Under the act of the 17th Geo. III., cap. 38, sec. 1. Mr. Rook has tendered the sum thereon demanded, but still the Alderman refuses to show the books. The Lord Mayor: What repeated applications have been made for that purpose.—The Lord Mayor (after looking at the Act of Parliament): I think it better to state at once that at half-past 5 o'clock this evening I shall sign an order upon the Bank of England, which, he stated, contained an account of his disbursements for the last eighteen years, and which I signed, he having made oath of their correctness; at the same time, I should require for the same to be produced this morning.—The clerk: Then I understand that Alderman Gibbs must now stand or fall by such statement. I am anxious to do my duty to the parishioners, and if you now demand a copy of the account I shall therefore grant it. Mr. Crosbie refused. I will grant a summons against Alderman Gibbs —you had better apply to him at once. Mr. Crosbie having thanked his lordship, retired. Mr. Howell, who was one of the deputies appointed by the parishioners, immediately waited upon Alderman Gibbs, at his residence in Walbrook, and was informed that the accounts were now being copied, and the moment they were finished he should be sent to Mr. Rook. And they for the present rests this long pending question, which will be speedily brought to a close

THE ATTEMPTED SUICIDE OF A SOLDIER AT LONDON BRIDGE.—High Bridge, late a soldier belonging to the Royal Artillery, and who attempted suicide at London Bridge, last week, was ordered to be conveyed to his parish, Newry, Ireland, pursuant to his own request.

Police Constable Evans, 541, of the City Police, was committed to Bridewell for one month with hard labour, for being found rolling drunk on the previous night on the steps of the Surrey-side of London Bridge, whilst on duty. He had a very narrow escape of being drowned.

THE ATTEMPTED SUICIDE IN THE CELL AT BOW-STREET.—The young man named Marshall, who was charged with embezzling various articles from the property of his master, and who made a most desperate attempt on his life, by cutting his throat in the station-house in Bow-street, on Saturday last, an account of which appeared in the Illustrated News of last week, is somewhat better; and although in a precarious state, hopes are entertained of his ultimate recovery.

THE REPEAL CRISIS.

DUBLIN, Thursday Evening, Five o Clock.

DISMISSAL OF A PEACE TEM. CHAIRMAN.—The Lord Chancellor having, at the instance of Mr. M'Dermott, chairman of the county of Kerry, appointed Mr. Hobart to the office, in consequence of the ill health of Mr. M'Dermott, and since having found out that Mr. Hobart was a Repealer, directed a compromise to take place upon the subject, which has terminated in the removal of Mr. Hobart.

LANDLORD AND TENANT LAWS.—The Freeman's Journal of this morning contains the following paragraph, which we give:—"We have heard it positively stated, and we have no doubt of the fact, that the Government has ordered a commission to issue to inquire into the tenure of land in Ireland. We understand that the chairmanship was offered to Mr. More O'Ferrall, but the right hon. member for Kildare declined the intended honour. We are not aware who the members of the commission are, where they propose to hold the inquiry, or when the proceedings open." The most beneficial results are expected from the labours of a commission appointed under such auspices.

THE REPEAL CRISIS.—Her Majesty's steamer Pluto has arrived in Limerick, for Cork, with ordnance and barrack stores. The Comet, government war steamship, is now moored at Limerick. She has been for some time engaged on the coast surveyat Waterford. The Stromboli, six gun steamer, is shortly expected at Cork on Woolwich

The Limerick Chronicle says, "that a preparatory repeal meeting was held at the Trades Hall on Monday evening, for the purpose of arranging for a public meeting to address Mr. O'Connell. The draft of the address states that the people of Limerick will not accept a federal parliament, they must have an independent one!"

Upwards of £4000 were drawn from the Limerick savings' bank on Monday by depositors, several of whom were anxious to re-invest immediately after, but the managers declined.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, attended by Colonel Sir George Couper, left her residence, Frogmore lodge, near Windsor, on Friday morning, for Whitley Court, Worcestershire, on a visit to her Majesty the Queen Dowager, accompanied by their Serene Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Hohenlohe Langenbourg.

THE GRAND DUKE MICHAEL.—On Thursday evening the Grand Duke Michael, accompanied by General Tolstoy, Col. Oligareff, Baron Tettenborn, Dr. Wylie, and Captain Meynell, R.N., M.P., arrived at Mivart's from Witton House, where the Grand Duke has been on a visit to the Countess of Pembroke.

A fire was discovered to have broken out in the spacious corridor at Frogmore House, at the early hour of half-past six o'clock on Tuesday morning, by one of the domestics; and had it not been for its fortunate detection at the time, there is very little doubt but that the splendid mansion must have been burnt to the ground. An alarm was instantly raised, and a good supply of water and assistance being at hand, the fire was speedily subdued. The splendid carpet, to the extent of some yards, and an ottoman, were burnt to a cinder, and other portions of the furniture which had ignited were considerably injured. The fire was occasioned by the overheating of a furnace.

MR. FERRAR.—It is true that after the play, on Tuesday last, there was a threatening of a seizure of a paralytic character, but not at all equal in severity to that which occurred to Mr. Farren upwards of twenty years ago.

THE CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.—THE ALLEGED SPY TRADING CASE —The trial of M. Pedro de Zulueta, on a charge of having manned, equipped, and employed a vessel called the Augusta, to trade in slaves, commenced on Friday morning.—Mr. Kelly made application to the court to allow the defendant to sit by the side of his counsel, on the ground that he was a Spaniard, and that he would have to communicate with them in reference to Spanish documents which would be used in the case.—Mr. Justice Maule, after consulting the precedents, refused the application, and said the court could not make any distinction with regard to persons.—Mr Zulueta then went into the dock. When he was called upon to plead he said firmly "I am not guilty;" and when asked if he wished his jury to be composed of half foreigners, he replied, "I have no wish for anything of the kind; I wish my case to be in the hands of Englishmen and nobody else."—The case then proceeded.

OBTAINING MONEY UNDER FALSE PRETENCES.—James Lester, a respectable-looking and middle-aged man, was acquitted on four separate indictments for obtaining money under false pretences, but found guilty on the fifth, and sentenced to seven years transportation.

ROBBING A LAUNDRESS.—Ann Morris, aged 39, was convicted of stealing seven handkerchiefs, of some people unknown. The prosecutrix was a laundress named Flanagan. There was another indictment against her, and she was transported for seven years

WIFE AND PEAVITY.—Joseph Faber, a diminutive youth, was indicted for stealing copper coins of the value of FIVEPENCE, the property of Eliza Gwillim. The prisoner was convicted on clear evidence, and it was then made apparent by the magistrate (Mr. Bingham) from the bench, that he had for trial on such a trivial charge The prisoner was convicted of housebreaking in the above Court, April, 1842, but on account of his youth he was sentenced to 12 months imprisonment in hard labour. The Common Serjeant sentenced him to 7 years transportation.

POLICE.—MANSION HOUSE. ALDERMAN GIBBS AND THE PARISH OF WALBROOK.—On Friday, immediately as the Lord Mayor took his seat, Mr. Crosbie, a solicitor, was observed to approach the bench with a book, which, he stated, contained an account of his disbursements for the last eighteen years, and which I signed, he having made oath of their correctness; at the same time, I should require for the same to be produced this morning.—The clerk: Then I understand that Alderman Gibbs must now stand or fall by such statement. I am anxious to do my duty to the parishioners, and if you now demand a copy of the account I shall therefore grant it. Mr. Crosbie refused. I will grant a summons against Alderman Gibbs —you had better apply to him at once. Mr. Crosbie having thanked his lordship, retired. Mr. Howell, who was one of the deputies appointed by the parishioners, immediately waited upon Alderman Gibbs, at his residence in Walbrook, and was informed that the accounts were now being copied, and the moment they were finished he should be sent to Mr. Rook. And they for the present rests this long pending question, which will be speedily brought to a close

THE ATTEMPTED SUICIDE OF A SOLDIER AT LONDON BRIDGE.—High Bryant, late a soldier belonging to the Royal Artillery, and who attempted suicide at London Bridge, last week, was ordered to be conveyed to his parish, Newry, Ireland, pursuant to his own request.

Police Constable Evans, 541, of the City Police, was committed to Bridewell for one month with hard labour, for being found rolling drunk on the previous night on the steps of the Surrey-side of London Bridge, whilst on duty. He had a very narrow escape of being drowned.

THE ATTEMPTED SUICIDE IN THE CELL AT BOW-STREET.—The young man named Marshall, who was charged with embezzling various articles from the property of his master, and who made a most desperate attempt on his life, by cutting his throat in the station-house in Bow-street, on Saturday last, an account of which appeared in the Illustrated News of last week, is somewhat better; and although in a precarious state, hopes are entertained of his ultimate recovery.

FOREIGN.

Our accounts from Madrid are of the 18th, when the verification of the members was in progress. On that day sixty-two deputies had been admitted and sworn in. Reports on the elections of fifty others were ready. The whole of the preliminary proceedings will be completed in a few days. This extraordinary haste has excited considerable disapprobation on all sides.

The Archduke Charles Louis, it is said, married in Rome the Pope's territories of Bologna, to the number of 4,000, under the command of Count Radetsky

The latest accounts from Natal are to the 1st August, when Mr. Cloete, the Commissioner, still remained at Port Natal. There seemed to be very little communication with the interior. Upon the state of this colony, one party and the [illegible] observes, that the farmers are worse than ever, and that the place is [illegible] a second Canada.

ROYAL VISITS TO THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

VISIT OF ELIZABETH, IN 1564.

Notice was given, through Sir William Cecil, the Chancellor, of her Majesty's intention to visit the university during the 8th, 9th, and 10th of August, 1564, and preparations for her reception were made accordingly. The Chancellor arrived on the 4th, and her Majesty herself on the 5th, everything being in perfect readiness, and the whole university assembled at King's College, and lined the road from Queen's College to King's College church (chapel) west door, kneeling as she passed, and crying Vivat Regina, the road being strewed with sand and rushes. As soon as the Queen entered the college the doors were shut, and none suffered to enter

The Queen visited the chapel of King's college at evening service. In the evening, plays were enacted before her Majesty, "by certain selected persons chosen out of all the colleges in the town;" and when these were ended, her Majesty departed to her lodging, about twelve o'clock, in such order as she came.

Upon Monday, at eight of the clock, the university bell did sound unto the ordinary lectures.

At nine o'clock was a disputation in art, at the Schools.

"The Queen had the questions delivered unto her. When the Respondent had ended his oration, four Masters of Arts (standing near her stage and looking westward) replied. As soon as this disputation was ended began the act of physic. First the Proctors willed the Disputers to propound the questions. Then Dr. Caius, as antiquity in the faculty, moved the questions. And then the Respondent made his position.

"The Questions were of one of her own physicians, Doctor of this University, named Dr. Hycke determined. With whom her Majesty merrily jested, when he desired licence of her Grace.

"After he had ended his oration, being about seven a clock, her Highness very merrily departed to her palace. And, about nine of the clock, came, as the night before, to a play called Dido; which was exhibited and played by and at the charges of the Company at the King's College. And from thence to her lodging

"Tuesday, the eighth of August. At night, about the accustomed hours, and in the same manner, her Highness came to the play called Ezechias, in English which was played by the King's College, and the charges thereof by them born And then her Majestie went to her rest.

"This day also order was taken, that her Majestie should remain here one day longer than at the first it was appointed. For her jestis were to depart upon the Wednesday. And a saying was if provision of beer and ale could have been made, her Grace would have remained all Friday; her Highness was so well pleased with all things.

"Wednesday the ninth of August, after the ordinary lectures and disputations were done, about six of the clock in the morning, the Queen's Majestie took her progress again from the Colleges ridyng in state royall, all the Lords and Gentlemen riding before her Grace; and all the Ladies following on horsebak. The Bedells waited upon her Highness, and in the same manner and order as on Sunday before.

She received various presents at the colleges as books, gloves, comfits, &c. &c. and was, at each, received with an oration in Greek or Latin, to which she replied in the same language, and so returned to her lodgings. At three, the disputations took place as before, and at the conclusion, her Majesty made a Latin oration, which was much applauded.

As a great deal of public curiosity has been recently excited respecting this production, we venture to think that, for three reasons, it may be deemed well worthy of a place in this brief sketch of the royal progress—first, it is a very choice and interesting document, appearing only in two or three rarely-consulted old records; secondly, it contains sound advice for all whom it may concern, and for all time; thirdly, it is short and to the point, and therefore the better adapted for newspaper quotation. There is another reason for its authentic publication at this moment, and it is this—that it has been just published at Cambridge; but, alas! with alterations. The oration which we transcribe is not any learned and fastidious Secundator's version, but Queen Elizabeth's own Latin, and very decent Latin it is, and in some parts very elegant. We stick to old Fuller, and in doing so we are not likely to go far astray —

"Etsi familiaris iste meus pudor, subditi fidelissimi et Academiæ charissimæ, in tanta doctorum turba illaboratum hunc sermonem et orationem me narrare apud vos impedit; tamen nobilium nostrum intercessus, et ergo Academiam benevolentia me aliqua ex parte proferre invitat. Duobus sed bano rem simulis moveor. Primus est bonarum literarum propagatio; alter est vestra omnium expectatio. Quod sed propugnationem spectat, unum illud apud Demosthenem memini: "Superiorum verba apud inferiores librorum locum habent, et Principum dicta legum authoritatem apud subditos retinent." Hoc igitur vos omnes in memoria tenere velim—quod sentia nulla præterea requiro, sive ad bona Fortunæ acquirenda, sive ad Principium gratiam conciliandam, quam gravitter (ut cupisis) studiis vestris exhibeatis operam. quod ut faciatis vos omnes ero obsecrquus. De secundo scimulo, vestra minirum expectatione, hoc unum dico, me nihil libenter præstaturum eorum esse, quod vestro de me animo benevolo conspicunt cogitationes. Jam ad Academiam venio. Tempore ante meridiano vidi ego ædificia vestra, sumptuosa a me majoribus clarissimis Principibus Henrico et Henrico cæptus extructa, et inter vehendum dolor artus meos occupavit, atque ea mentis suspiria quæ Alexandrum quondam trusses feruntur; qui cum legisset mulia a Principibus, monumenta virorum et familiarum, sumptus et constructiones, multum doluit se illud tale fecisse. Hinc tamen vulgaris sententia me aliquantum recreavit, quæ etsi non auferre, tamen minuere potest dolorem. Quæ quidem sententia hoc est:—

"Romam non uno ædificatam fuisse die."

Tamen nec ista sensitis mea, nec tamen hæc ædificia quo regnare cœpit, quin ante redituram debui naturæ (si non nimis uto Atropos lineam vitæ meæ amputaverit aliquod opus faciam; et quamdiu vita hos regit artus nunquam a proposito desciam. Hic quoniam conjugat (quam cito futurum sit, nescio) me mori oportere prius quam hoc ipsum quod pollicear complere possim, aliquod tamen egregium opus post mortem relinquam, quo et memoria in posterum celebris fiat, et ejus exitum exemplo nosce, et vos omnes ædificare hortari ad studia vestra. Sed jam videtis quantum interest inter doctrinam lectam et disciplinam animo non retentam. Quorum alterius sunt complures satis sufficientes testes; alterius autem vos omnes simili quidem locupletissimos testes hodie tempore effert, quo meo barbaro orationis genere tamdiu doctas vestras aures detinuerim. Dixi!"

As no translation of this now celebrated speech accompanies it in the ancient records, and as it may prove acceptable to the majority of our fair readers who must feel naturally interested concerning such a highly creditable production from one of their own sex, and a queen, we beg to present them with one which they will find literal, and, we hope, correct.

Queen Elizabeth sojourned between five and six days amongst the learned doctors, seeing everything that was to be seen, hearing everything that was to be heard, and, during the ancient Latin disputations which she directed, and all though she had tasted plentifully of the waters of persecution during the reign of her miserable predecessor, she had at the same time endeavoured to drink the waters of Helicon, by draughts from the classic fountains of antiquity. It has, however, been observed that Her Majesty had fine weather, and the spirit of that age was very different from the present. The personal persons of these revellers with which Queen Elizabeth was favoured could not have occupied more than an hour altogether; the Public Orator's congratulatory Latin oration, about half an hour. The rest of the exercises took about three hours during each of four or five days to get through them. These consisted chiefly of philosophy acts, and disputations in scholastic theology, ethics, and civil law, in all of which the Queen took a lively interest, and, after the termination of one of the exercises, bestowed distinguished marks of favour to Preston, a Fellow of King's college. The Latin oration of the Public Orator (Masters) was by far the most eloquent production of these exercises; the Greek Ode was "so so;" the Latin Poems, combined to make one, not much better; and the English Ode has little to recommend it but its quaintness.

Matthias Gibbs was to the unanimity which prevailed amongst the learned doctors of the university on account of the political and religious acerbities which other leading circumstances of these changing times gave rise to; but Fuller, states, with regard to this royal visit, that "acts being ended, degrees conferred, university officers well rewarded, and all persons pleased, her Majesty went on in her progress, and the scholars returned to their studies."

On Wednesday, the day of her Latin oration, her Majesty had exerted herself very much, and declined witnessing a Latin tragedy in the evening.

Next morning, Thursday, Aug. 10, at nine o'clock, the Queen took her departure for the Bishop of Ely's at Stanton, where she dined, proceeding afterwards to Hinchinbrook for the night.

The University of Cambridge was again honoured during the next reign by the presence of the Sovereign, in the person of the shrewd but eccentric James the I—. His Majesty, in his way from Scotland, on his accession to the throne, had stopped at Hinchinbrook, near Huntingdon, the residence of the Cromwells, and of Oliver's uncle, and received there the heads of houses in the university, who met to pay their loyal respects to him. He was greatly affected by the Latin oration, which was made before him, and which he felt a great relief after all the Corporation addresses he had received on his way, but he made no Latin oration in return. The hospitality of Hinchinbrook, for splendour and liberality, was much spoken of at the time. About eleven years afterwards he visited the university, accompanied by his son, Prince Charles.

VISIT OF JAMES THE FIRST IN 1614.

On this occasion, Paul Tomson, one of the seniors of Trinity college, who had been convicted of clipping gold coin, and confined in Cambridge castle, and deprived of his fellowship, was freely pardoned by the King. Another pardon was given to Bainbridge, and during that time visited Newmarket and many adjacent places. He left the University enamoured of his learning and ingenious descension.

VISIT OF QUEEN ANNE IN 1705.

Her Majesty was passing the mouth of April, 1705, at the royal residence a Newmarket, went over on the 16th, accompanied by her husband and her whole court, to Cambridge, the University of Cambridge. Alchthe at the Regent House, before the Schools, she was received by the Duke of Somerset, the Chancellor, at the head of the university, and addressed in a speech by Dr. Aylofle, the Public Orator. From thence her Majesty went in procession to the Senate House, where, agreeably to ancient custom, was held the Congregation of the Senate, termed Regno Comitiis, at which the university conferred degrees upon all persons considered by the royal command; the progress of the Sovereign dispensing with statutable qualifications and exercises Afterwards the Queen held a court at Trinity Lodge, where she rendered this day memorable by conferring knighthood upon the most illustrious of her subjects, Sir Isaac Newton. A sumptuous dinner was then given to the royal visitor and her suite, in the hall of Trinity college, which had been newly fitted up and decorated. Whoever is acquainted with the many sums which Alma Mater has since expended on public objects, will be surprised to learn that she was then so poor as to be compelled to borrow £500, for the purpose of this entertainment. The royal party, after attending a evening service at the magnificent chapel of King's college, took leave of the university, and returned the same night to Newmarket.

VISIT OF GEORGE THE FIRST IN 1717.

His Majesty, in imitation of his predecessors, visited Newmarket with his court. The Vice-Chancellor, Heads, and other members of the university went over to invite him to honour Cambridge with his presence. The Sovereign gave them a gracious reception, and promised to visit the university on Sunday, the 6th of October, and by this short notice precluded, as far as possible, all expensive preparations. Upon the present occasion, a list was prepared, comprising 27 noblemen and others in the King's suite, who were to be made Doctors of Laws, and 32 of the most distinguished members of the university, on whom the degree of Doctor of Divinity was to be conferred

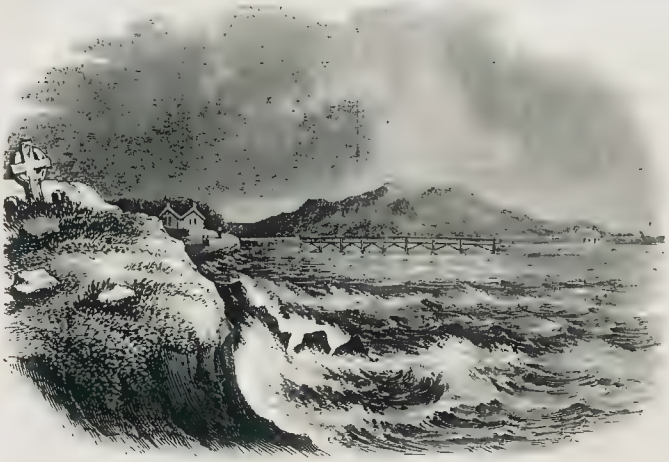
The proud Duke of Somerset, Chancellor of the University, arrived on the same day, and excited nearly as much homage as the Sovereign himself.

The university people came ten miles and farther to see this solemnity, and the King was pleased to show himself openly, admitted every body where he dined made presents to the poor of all the parishes, to the two gaols, to the ringers of every church, and to the nurses of Trinity college

About seven years afterwards, his Majesty gave a magnificent donation of £2,000 towards building the Senate House, and bestowed on the office of Professorship of Modern History. He also appointed salaries for twelve preachers from each University to officiate in turn at the Royal Chapel, Whitehall

The next and last visit of our English Solomon was to no more, who honoured Cambridge with a visit, was George the Second, in 1728.

King George the Second having announced his intention of visiting his university at Cambridge, the most precipitous were seen for his reception. His Majesty reached Newmarket on the 23rd of April. The Vice-Chancellor, Dr. Lambert, Master of St. John's, went over on the morrow, accompanied by the heads, to entreat his presence; which invitation he accepted for the following day. His Majesty came, attended by a noble retinue, among whom were no less than seven Dukes; being met by the Mayor and Corporation on horseback before he reached the town, he was conducted across Christ's College Piece to the entrance of Cambridge by Emmanuel. His Majesty took his leave in the evening, after marking his satisfaction with the university by another noble present of £2,000 towards the completion of the Senate House, having given £1,000 while Prince of Wales,



VIEW OF "CONQUER" HILL, CLONTARF.

CONQUER HILL, CLONTARF.

Remember the glories of Brian the Brave,
Though the days of the hero are o'er,
Though lost to Monona,* and cold in the grave,
He returns to Kinkora† no more.
MOORE.

In choosing this national spot, Clontarf, for the great meeting, which was prevented by proclamation, the modern Irish have shown a good deal of sympathy with their ancestors, only that, thanks to Heaven, they are more peaceably inclined now-a-days, and wish to right themselves or redress their grievances by

The wiser war of words
Than that of brutal swords.

The plains, or, as they are called by the natives, sheds, of Clontarf, lie somewhat to the northward of the city of Dublin, on the sea-shore, and are as famous in their chronicles as the Pass of Thermopylæ, or any other locale of a national resistance against foreign invasion, could possibly be in the mind of a classical enthusiast. It has been recorded that the intruding Danes were signally defeated on this spot by the redoubtable Brian; although (sad tale to tell) he, with his son and grandson, lost their lives in the strife. According to some historians, there were 11,000 Danes compelled to seek a treacherous refuge in the sea from the steel (or rather brazen†) swords of the bravely-resisting natives. Some others are more moderate, and state the amount of the "fallen foe" to have been but 1100. Of this conflict we find the following details in an ancient Irish manuscript, entitled "Cath Chluana Tarbh:"—

The battle of Clontarf was the effect of a sarcasm by the unsuccessful competitor at a game of chess. Maelmordha, who usurped the crown of Leinster in 976, by the assistance of the Danes, being at an entertainment at Kincora, saw Morogh, Brian's eldest son, at a game of chess, and advised his antagonist to a move which lost Morogh the game; whereupon Morogh observed to him with a sneer, that if he had given as good advice at the battle of Glen-mama, the Danes would not have received so great an overthrow. To which Maelmordha replied—"My instructions, the next time, shall guide them to victory;" and Morogh, with contempt, bade defiance. Maelmordha became enraged, retired to his bed-chamber, and did not appear at the banquet, but passed the night in restless anger, and ruminating his country's ruin. Early next morning he set out for Leinster, without taking his leave of the monarch or any of his household, to show that he was bent on desperate revenge. The good monarch, on hearing of his departure, sent one of his servants after him to request his reconciliation with Morogh. The servant overtook him east of the Shannon, not far from Killaloe, and delivered his message from the monarch. Maelmordha, who all the while listened with indignation, as soon as the servant had done speaking, raised the rod of yew which he had in his hand, and with three furious blows thereof fractured the skull of the servant, to make known to Brian how he rejected such reconciliation. He pursued his way on horseback to Leinster, where, the next day, he assembled his subjects, represented to them the insults he had received at Kincora, and inflamed them to so great a degree that they renounced their allegiance to Brian, confederated with the Danes, and set the monarch at defiance all

The sea, which rolls in at Clontarf with great force, whenever the wind blows strong from the southward, has much diminished it since the days of "Brian the Brave;" composed as it is, for the most part, of hard clay, but which can ill resist the incessant action of the watery surges. The remains of a "rath," or mound, underneath which the bodies of the Irish who were slain in the battle of Clontarf are said to have been buried, are still visible. This hill, as may be supposed, is held in great veneration by the common people, who have erected a rude cross on its summit. In the middle distance of the view is the great pier or wall erected to prevent the sand from choking the entrance to the port of Howth, above the Hill of Howth rises in black and solitary grandeur, and forms, with its bold headland, the northern boundary of the beautiful bay of Dublin. The circumstances of the sketch, taken the day after the intended meeting, may be called on

Clontarf has not much to boast of in scenic or cultivated beauty in itself or neighbourhood, if we except Lord Charlemont's classic villa and demesne, but it looks, across the Bay of Dublin, on one of the finest prospects in the world to those hills ——— in whose bosom the bright waters meet;

and where, like the present patriot's hope, there are

Visions of beauty—peace—contentment—seen,
Though a rough sea may chance to heave between.

THE CITY OF LONDON ELECTION.

In the late editions of our paper of last week, we detailed the nomination of a citizen to serve in Parliament, for the city of London, in the place of Sir Matthew Wood, Bart., deceased, which took place at the Guildhall, on Friday, at twelve o'clock. We now present our readers with a spirited engraving of the extraordinary scene presented on the hustings, and in the area of the Great Hall. In each place our artist has preserved some electioneering episodes, which are rife with enthusiasm, and characteristic English humour. The ardour of the candidates and their respective supporters, and the melée of the restless crowd, are well portrayed. Above the hustings is shown the great eastern window, through whose tinted frames the light streams upon the anxious faces of the vast assemblage in the Hall.

On Saturday, the day of polling, the Guildhall was, throughout the day, a scene of bustle, and not unpleasing excitement, such as nothing but a contested election in a free country can afford. Numbers of persons thronged thither for the purpose of polling for either one or other of the two candidates (Messrs. Baring and Pattison), or of witnessing the amusing proceedings which usually take place on such occasions; when the full license of electioneering strife is allowed, and the mother-wit of the mob is so prolific in fun, frolic, and good-natured personalities. The polling commenced at eight o'clock, and from that hour the hall was occupied by crowds of persons, and actively traversed by the partisans of either side, anxious to make a good show at the end of the first hour for their respective candidate. The same excitement continued throughout the day, enlivened by the alternate exultations of the parties.

The arrangements made by the sheriffs were so perfect, that between eight and ten o'clock nearly 5,000 electors had recorded their votes. There were appointed 43 poll clerks, to take the votes; and to each 240 votes were assigned, thus allowing to each two minutes to take a vote in. Our second engraving represents this busy scene, beneath the great western window of the Guildhall, where stand the tutelar giants, Gog and Magog. This area, too, has all the animus of a "sharp contest."

The poll was closed at four o'clock; after which Mr. Pattison and his friends addressed the assemblage, and the crowd dispersed.

The official declaration of the poll took place at Guildhall on Monday, when the sheriffs declared the numbers to be—For Mr. Pattison, 6,532; Mr. Baring, 6,367; Majority for Mr. Pattison, 165. The successful candidate was prevented from attending by a sprained ancle, but the chairman of his committee, Mr. Travers, returned thanks on his behalf. Mr. Baring also expressed his acknowledgments for the support he had received, but was scarcely heard, through the tumult which prevailed among his opponents.

The following statement of the numbers will show how each candidate stood at the end of every hour up to four o'clock:—

CITY OF LONDON ELECTION—THE NOMINATION.

APSLEY HOUSE.—The splendid furniture of the state apartments has been uncovered, and preparations commenced for the reception of the Duke of Wellington, who, it is expected, previous to his departure for Strathfieldsaye, for the hunting season, will entertain his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michel.

It is understood that a marriage is on the tapis between Lady Chantrey, relict of the late Sir Francis Chantrey, the eminent sculptor, and Mr. Corbould, the artist. Her ladyship is staying at Tunbridge-wells.

CITY OF LONDON ELECTION—THE POLLING.

LOSS OF THE BURHAMPOOTER.

Among the many distressing casualties that have occurred at sea, within these few days, we regret to record the total loss of the British-built ship Burhampooter, Captain C. G. Cowley, commander. About six o'clock on the morning of the 18th, she was driven from her anchor during the storm, on the rocks off the south-east portion of the town of Margate. The ship was 550 tons burthen, and stood in the class A 1 at Lloyd's. She was the property of Captain Arthur, and was chartered by Carter and Bonus, the emigrant agents of Leadenhall-street, for the conveyance of emigrants on the part of government to Port Philip. On the previous Monday she sailed from the London Docks, having on board ninety-four emigrants, besides the crew. They consisted of twenty-one women, forty-four children, and the rest men, chiefly belonging to the labouring class. The voyage to sea was as favourable as could be desired, and it was the intention of the captain to proceed on to Cork, for the purpose of receiving the remainder of the emigrants; but, bad weather threatening, she hove to on Tuesday night in the Margate Roads, and anchored, orders being given to make her as snug as possible. The ship rode the gale gallantly, and hopes were entertained that she would ride it out, when a fearful blast drove her from her anchorage, and she was instantly hurled by the currents on the chalk rocks, about half a mile distant from Margate town, between Clifton Baths and Kingston, the sea at the same time breaking over her decks. All was confusion on board, and the shock being so great as to carry away her rudder, she was bilged, and as instantly filled. The decks were now crowded by the affrighted emigrants. The captain entreated them to place themselves under his command, when he would most assuredly promise them that they all would be saved. Fortunately, they obeyed his wish, and, in a short time, several Margate luggers came off and succeeded in taking every soul from off the ill-fated ship, and landing them safely. The poor emigrants were in a most deplorable state, being completely drenched, and in their night-clothes, the catastrophe having occurred after they had retired to rest. Carts having been procured, they were, without loss of time, conveyed to Margate, where they were billeted at the several public-houses. The above facts have been confirmed by letters from the captain to Carter and Bonus, who, immediately on knowing the fact, caused a messenger to be dispatched to Margate in order to conduct the emigrants back to London, where suitable accommodation has been provided them until the sailing of the next packet (the Royal Consul) on the 1st of November next. The vessel lay about a quarter of a mile from the land, and some hopes were felt during Wednesday that she would be got off, being in an upright position; but the gale continuing during the whole of the night, on Thursday morning she was found on her beam ends. At low water, she was high and dry, full a quarter of a mile from the sea, and there was not a doubt among the pilots and other nautical men at Margate, that if she had not been a strong built ship, nothing could have saved her from going to pieces at the moment of striking, when all on board must have been lost. She was built at Sunderland in 1841. We regret to add that on Saturday she became a total wreck, and very little of her stores have been saved. Her loss and stores are estimated at £12,000; but she was insured. The poor emigrants are the greatest sufferers, for they have lost nearly every article they possessed; but the contractors, Messrs. Carter and Bonus, have humanely undertaken to supply them at their own expense with bedding, and also things sufficient for their voyage in another ship. A subscription has also been opened for further supplying them with clothes and the necessary tools for their trades; without which aid they would most probably be landed in a distant country in comparative destitution. We perceive that these sufferers have been aided from the funds of the Shipwrecked Fishermen and Mariners' Benevolent Society—an institution worthy of especial support from those who can enjoy "the luxury of doing good."

WRECK OF THE "BURHAMPOOTER," OFF MARGATE.

CONVEYING THE EMIGRANTS FROM THE WRECK.

The surface of the sea is estimated at 150,000,000 square miles, taking the whole surface of the globe at 197,000,000 square miles. Its greatest depth is supposed to be equal to the height of the highest mountain, or four miles.

King James the First took upon himself to teach the Latin tongue to Car, Earl of Somerset; and Gondomar, the Spanish Ambassador, would speak false Latin to him, on purpose to give him the pleasure of correcting it, whereby he wrought himself into his good graces.

Be not ashamed to confess you have been in the wrong. It is but owning, what you need not be ashamed of, that you now have more sense than you had before, to see your error—more humility to acknowledge it—and more grace to correct it.

A lady gave a young girl five pounds, as a marriage portion. She soon got a partner, whom she presented to her patroness. Her ladyship asked her how she could think of marrying such a diminutive and deformed creature? when she answered, with great naïveté, "What could I expect for five pounds?"

Daily newspapers were not printed in England till the war between King Charles I. and the Parliament; and it has been remarked in those discordant times, as during the distracted state of our Gallic neighbours, a printing press was considered a necessary and important part of camp baggage. Each party was desirous of the victory of the pen as with the sword, besides the advantage of a rapid diffusion of information. By Cromwell it was carried to Scotland, and Higgins printed the first paper in that kingdom in 1652. It was called "The Diurnal of some Passages and Affairs," &c.

A little boy, nine or ten years of age, was called as a witness at a late trial at Cambridge. After the oath was administered, the Chief Justice, with a view of ascertaining whether the boy was sensible of the nature and importance of an oath, addressed him, "Little boy, do you know what you have been doing?" "Yes, sir (the boy replied), I have been keeping pigs for Mr. Banyard."

The Treaty with China.—Extract of a Letter from a Naval Officer.—At five p.m., the captains in full dress (barometer 100) met at Government House; all the troops, officials, and public being present to witness the ratification of the treaty of peace, which was done in great form under salutes from the forts and ships. The Chinese did not seem to care about it, but it was comfort to us to find that they felt the heat as much as we did; but when dinner came the scene was different. We sat down in white jackets, about 50. The commissioners appeared quite at their ease; they drank an enormous quantity of wine, chatted, laughed, and finished every glass, turning it over to show it was empty, and helping themselves from the decanters. Old Keying (the Chief Commissioner) must have taken 50 large glasses of wine at least. When dinner was removed, the Queen and Emperor of China were drunk in one toast, with three times three. We then drank to Keying's health, who would not be done out of his glass, but drank too. He then gave us a Chinese song—such noises! What do you think of the Emperor's uncle singing a song?) After this, he called upon the Governor, Sir H. Pottinger, who gave us an English song, when Wang (the second Commissioner) gave us another Chinese one, and called on another Englishman, and then the old Tartar general, whose performance surpasses all description: such a collection of noises I never heard before. He then called on Lord Saltoun, who gave us a jolly song, when old Keying commenced again. And so passed the evening, till near eleven o'clock, the old fellows taking wine enough for six at least, and walking off pretty steady.

THE FIRST FREE CHURCH IN GLASGOW.

The exterior of the first free church erected in Glasgow, is now completed. It is situated in West Regent-street, and is a handsome structure, of bold and massive proportions, in the Anglo-Norman Ecclesiastical, or early Christian style, of architecture, of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, a style, by its economy, peculiarly adapted to the present circumstances. The front elevation presents a broad and lofty appearance, distinguished by large circular-headed windows and doors, and square buttresses, each supporting a handsome belfry, ornamented with Norman pillars and intersecting arches, which have a rich and pleasing effect. Projecting from the face of the buttresses, we see, for the first time, the restoration of the ancient rain water-spout, in the shape of two grotesque figures, technically called Gargoyles, examples of which, though much dilapidated, may still be seen over the Clerestory windows in the Glasgow Cathedral. The following quotation from "Lydgate's Boke of Troye," will show the antiquity and use of this feature of the Norman, and subsequent pointed, style of architecture:—

> And every house covered was with lead,
> And many a Gargoyle, and many a hideous head,
> With spouts through, and pipes as they ought,
> From the stone work to the kennel wrought."

The interior arrangements of this church are in excellent keeping. The ceiling is diagonally ribbed and enriched at the intersections and imposts with bosses and foliated corbels. By means of openings on each side of the ribs, a complete system of ventilation has been effected. We understand the design of the pulpit is in strict conformity with the architecture of the building, and will form a handsome finish to the interior. The whole is highly creditable to the taste and skill of Mr. J. T. Rochead, the architect; who has been intrusted with the designs of several other churches in this quarter.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, October 24.

SPAIN.

Yesterday a Cabinet courier reached Paris, from Madrid, with despatches for the Ambassador. An hour afterwards, M. Olozaga called on M. Guizot, and remained for nearly two hours in private conference with him. It is currently reported to-day that the news from Spain is anything but satisfactory, and great fears are entertained that the Minister will not be able to carry the "majority question." Already have serious dissensions arisen among the leading deputies. One party—at the head of which, ostensibly, is M. Isturitz, but, in reality, Narvaez—demands that the minority of the Queen shall continue, and that Christina be recalled, and again declared "Reina Governadora" of the kingdom. Another party—not numerous—intend to propose an amendment to the Government project, that the minority continue, and that three Regents be appointed, having for President the Infant Don Francisco de Paula. The remainder of the deputies are divided into small fractions—some ultra Liberals, others Fueristas, Carlists, &c. A Parliament so composed cannot last long, and you may, therefore, be prepared for serious events before the end of the year. It was wrongfully supposed, that because a large majority named M. de Ouis President of the Senate, that the Ministers were strongly supported. The nomination compromised no one: the struggle will be on the "majority question." Should the ministers succeed, he assured me they discussed will serve, and to raise the provinces; and here I am afraid they will find little difficulty. Spain is prepared, and on the eve of a terrible convulsion. Let us see how stands the different parts of the unhappy country. I have already noticed in my former correspondence, that Andalusia, Estremadura, and Gallacia, were only kept from an open revolt by the troops remaining faithful to the government. At present the soldiers are upon the point of the moment money falls due. They will join the insurgents. Lico, a city situated between Valladolid and Oviedo, with a population of about 12,000, has openly declared in favour of the Central Junta, and notwithstanding it is an open town, and the imposing force sent against it, it still holds out, supported by the mass of the surrounding peasantry. Lower Aragon is daily becoming more agitated. The Conchs negotiations have ended, as I foretold, in rupture, and hostilities have recommenced before Sarragossa. The insurgents and Queenites gain alternate petty advantages but as late as the 18th the insurgents remained not only masters of the fortress, but received great support from the neighbouring towns and villages. The latest accounts from Catalonia are to the 17th. The insurrection gained ground, and several petty engagements had taken place between the National Guards and the Queen's troops, sent out to disarm the former, and in many instances the National Guards were victorious. The insurgents in Barcelona seem certain of ultimate success; they possess plenty of ammunition, provisions, and money; within the last week they coined 750,000 reals. A decree has been issued by the Junta, ordering, under the penalty of death, all persons from the age of 17 to 50 to immediately take up arms. This order will give the insurgents an imposing force; the population now remaining in Barcelona is about 60,000, of whom about 7000 are armed; the insurgents have also a free corps of about 3000 men. The emigration exceeds 100,000 persons. It was reported that the steam boat "Isabella II." had captured in the Gulph of Rosas, a small vessel laden with ammunition for the insurgents. Prim continued before Girona; it is now said that he intended opening his batteries on the 15th. One of the last orders of Prim is flukly discreditable. In my last I informed you that he had given permission for the women and children to quit Girona, previous to commencing hostilities; I now learn that, availing himself of some frivolous pretext, he has not only countermanded the order, but insists on all the women and children who had left the town to return to it. The Basque Provinces are far from being tranquil; the National Guards, both infantry and cavalry, of Pampeluna, have been disarmed; those of Bilboa, Bergara, Eeicilla, and many other places in Biscay and Navarre, openly declare themselves against the present order of things. This is the present state of Spain—it cannot last.

M. Carnerero has been named ambassador at the Court of Lisbon, replacing M. Aydular.

ITALY.

The last accounts from Italy are to the 10th. The insurgents, it would appear, did not consider themselves beaten, and have again made their appearance, not only in Bologna, but the adjacent country. On the 3rd a very serious affair took place at Bologna, in the streets and squares de San Pietro, Di Nettuno, and several other places, between the people and a strong detachment of infantry and cavalry. The infantry were compelled to retreat, but, a piquet of cavalry coming up, the people were dispersed. Six soldiers were killed, and a Roman was seriously wounded. On the 8th the people attacked and disarmed several military posts. The Papal Government having demanded support from the Austrian Government, Prince Metternich instantly gave orders to Field-Marshal Hoditzky to march 4,000 men to the extreme frontiers, and orders to cross should they be required by the Pope. It was reported that the Austrian Government had contracted a loan of several millions sterling, and that a small force, under Field-Marshal order to be prepared, should the affairs of Rome and Naples become more serious.

Mr. de Kutzner, the Hanoverian plenipotentiary, quitted Rome on the 9th for Naples. It is said that he is charged with a mission to conclude a treaty of commerce and navigation with the King of the Two Sicilies.

Letters from Florence, of the 10th, state that Count de Survilliers (Joseph Bonaparte) had had several attacks of apoplexy, and that his life was despaired of.

FRANCE.

The general subject of conversation in almost every circle is the Chinese expedition now on the point of sailing; many of the opposition journals attack the Government, accusing it with want of energy, and more particularly in not permitting the men of war to be heavily laden with silk patterns; the general opinion is, however, in favour of M. Guizot. It is stated that the expedition will consist of Terrible, Rio Janeiro, Cape of Good Hope, Madagascar, Island of Mauritius, Pondicherry, Manilla, and Singapore; it will not reach China before June next. Several cabinet councils had been held on the affairs of China, and the Court were desirous of the speedy departure of the vessels despatched to several foreign courts.

The King and Queen of the Belgians continue residing with the Royal Family at Saint Cloud. The Spanish ambassador, M. Olozaga, delivered a fine dejeuné, with great solemnity, in the presence of all the ministers, the decorations of the Golden Fleece, to the Duke of Nemours. This being the birthday of the Duke of Nemours, there is a grand gala at Saint Cloud; the Duke was born on the 25th of October, 1814, consequently, 29 years of age.

Wood pavement is likely to be extensively employed in Paris; workmen are laying it down from the Rue St. Honoré to the Rue Mondpensier. In a few days the statue of Molière will be placed on the fountain, in the Rue Richelieu. Monsieur le Comte de Montrond, one of the most esteemed confidential friends of Prince Talleyrand, died on the 11th of October, at the age of 79 years. It is generally believed that the Count possessed many curious and important documents, likely to be published by his heirs.

The gale on the coast, on the night of the 17th, was most severe, and several vessels were stranded between Havre and Le Hoc, amongst others, the English brigs James Wells, Captain Gaire, and the James, Captain Carter; the brother of the captain, and seven seamen, were drowned. The Lord Durham, laden with coals, ran ashore to the north of Havre, the crew saved. There was also a violent tempest about the same time in the Mediterranean; no less than 19 vessels were wrecked in the roads of Marseilles.

Mr. Cubitt, accompanied by Mr. Hopkins, has examined the line from Boulogne to Amiens, and has given it as his decided opinion that a railroad could be easily had down, and that the estimate made by the French engineers would suffice to carry out the work.

Last week 700 barrels of wine were seized in the cellar of a Mr. Pardon, and being found adulterated, all the proprietors of Bordeaux wine was thrown into the river. I believe the Rouen wine merchants hope been long speculating in cheap Bordeaux wines.

Amongst the convicts lately incarcerated in the galleies of Toulon is the ex-Bey of Tlemecen, condemned by the Criminal Court of Algiers to imprisonment for life. He was found guilty of assassinating a French aide major, whom he found in a delicate position with his wife.

You are probably aware that all the public places of amusement, concerts, &c., are obliged to give 10 per cent. of their net proceeds to the Government, or, as it is rather called, "Droit des Pauvres." From one of these documents just published it appears, that in the last 35 years, the "Grand Opera" has paid this tax to no less a sum than 2,573,000 francs, and the "Theatre Français," 2,215,000 francs; all the other theatres have contributed in proportion.

The races on Sunday last in the Champs de Mars were well attended. The Duke de Nemours was present.

The first run for 2,500 francs, easily won by Native, the property of Prince de Beauveau. The next, the Royal purses of 14,000 francs, was beautifully won by Jenny, also the property of Prince Beauveau. Both Jenny and Naiva are out of Royal Oak.

The company of Juvenile Actors belonging to the theatre in the Passage de Panorama, lately destroyed by fire, leave on the 29th for England. The Director, M. Morel, hopes to reap a rich harvest in London.

Notwithstanding the sudden cold weather, Paris continues very dull, most of the principal families not leaving the country until the end of the month.

Next every day but week the first, Donizetti's opera, "Don Sebastian," was rehearsed, with a full orchestra, at the Grand Opera. The funeral scene, in the third act, is truly beautiful in melody and scenery. The decoration of the first act is magnificent, it represents the port of Lisbon, with a large fleet and many vessels raising anchor; on the quays are a great many soldiers pm paring to embark for Africa. The opera buffo to be brought out immediately after is "Don Sebastien," by Madame Gail and Monsieur Vietti; thereafter Halévy the libretto by St. George; the principal parts are confided to Mdes. Stoki and Dorus-Gras, and MM. Lavasseur and Massoli. It is reported that the directors of the opera have entered into an engagement with Fanny Elsler.

Mariani debuted last month at the Opera of Dresden, in "Lucia," with immense success. He is engaged for the Baden Opera. Report speaks highly of a Signora Caterina Bedel, pupil of Madame Malibran, who will shortly make her appearance at Milan. The musical season opened in Lisbon with "Belisario." Botelli appeared as first bass, and Fatorni as principal tenor. Madame Rosi Lacaza made out in the Anna Bolena." Her success was most enthusiastic; the stage was literally strewed with flowers thrown from every part of the house.

Four o'Clock.

Letters from Seville of the 19th state that the people and the soldiers were fight ing in the streets. There have been, and continue, serious disturbances at Salamanca.

WEST INDIES.

The Royal West India mail packet, the Trent, three days over-due, arrived at Southampton at half past ten o'clock on Tuesday. She brings the Jamaica and Carthagenian mails, and left Kingston, Jamaica, on the 23rd ult.; Acmel, Hayti of the 20th; St. Juan, Porto Rico, on the 27th; St. Thomas's, on the last inst.; and Fayal on the 16th. The Trent experienced very rough weather, and was obliged to put in at Fayal for coal, which accounts for her detention. The Avon arrived at Grenada on the morning of the 20th of September, with the outward mails, and sailed again the same day; at the same date the Tweed left Barbadoes, for Tobago and Demerara. The Trent brings six passengers and fourteen invalids, and a small quantity of gold and silver.

ANTIGUA.—Considerable distress prevailed in this island at the way in which the charitable relief fund, provided for the sufferers by the earthquake of the 8th of February, had been distributed. A general system of favouritism is said to have prevailed, from which, it is added, the indigent poor were excluded. Persons of affluence and distinction were compensated for the loss of costly furniture, whilst many homeless and shelterless persons were left altogether unprovided for. It this cannot be true it will go far to check the tide of liberality on future occasions of distress.

JAMAICA.—It appears that the effects of the recent fire at Kingston have been most disastrous. Numerous public meetings had been held in various parts of the island for the purpose of collecting subscriptions to alleviate the distresses of the sufferers. At Kingston, the scene of the dreadful disaster, the subject uppermost in the public mind is the relief of the sufferers. Much sympathy has been created in their behalf, not only in the city itself, but throughout the whole island, and efforts are being made to afford them something more than temporary relief.

The merchants of Kingston, grateful for the assistance afforded by the army and navy, on the occasion of the fire, have made up two purses—one of 500 dollars, for distribution among the latter; and one of 1,000 dollars, for the former, both of these, however, were declined. In doing so, Captain Houston, the senior naval officer on the station, feelingly remarked, that the money would be well bestowed in assuaging the wounds of the sufferers. Major-General Berkeley, on the part of the army, declined also, and expressed himself in similar terms.

The Jamaica and Planters' Bank have held their half-yearly meeting. The former has declared a dividend of 4½ per cent., and the latter 5. The former has sustained a loss of £8,000 during the six months up to June 30.

The Speaker has been called to meet and preside over the business on the 24th Oct. There will be three vacancies in the meeting of the assembly.

The city is healthy, but trade is perfectly stagnant, and money scarce and not to be had.

Lord Elgin remains well.

The yellow fever was still prevalent at St. Jago de Cuba.

The intelligence from Hayti was of a most unsatisfactory

The following is a list of the passengers on board the Montrose.—Messrs. Wells, Woodfield, Robertson, R.N., A. G. Bonar, Count Limbaus, Don A. Bouza, Viscount Canisin and servant, Mr. Wilcocks, Mrs. Lahit, Mrs. Bullmore, Mr. Jan Rafe.

On the morning of the Montrose leaving Cuba, information received of a serious conflict having taken place between the Spanish troops and the insurgents and natives, in which several of the latter were killed. Two Italian officers and two privates were also killed, in assisting to quell the disturbance.

Vessels arrived at St. Jago de Cuba, the Isabella Primera, of 18 guns, from Cadiz, with several officers and troops on board; the Independencia Española, of 18 guns, also arrived at St. Jago de Cuba, on the 1st instant, from La Guayra and Cumana, with the following officers and troops on board:—Captain Don Manuel Garcia Cabrera and Peraita, of three guns each.

YELLOW FEVER AT CUBA.—By the Royal Mail Company's steam-packet Trent, which left St. Jago de Cuba at six o clock, last Sunday morning, we regret to learn that the yellow fever was still prevalent at that place, but not to so alarming an extent as was previously reported.

LATEST FROM THE UNITED STATES.—The Cambridge packet ship, Captain Barslow, arrived in the Mersey at one o'clock on Thursday, bringing dates from New York one day later than those previously received. The Canadian Parliament was opened on the 28th ult., by Sir C. Metcalfe in person, who, in his address, made a feeling allusion to the death of his predecessor, and the respect paid to his remains by the people of the United States.

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

INDIA AND CHINA

We have received the letters and papers from China and India which should have arrived in the early part of the present month. The dates brought by this mail are—Calcutta, 10th; Scinde, 19th; and Bombay, 26th of August. From China, 28th of June only.

Their intelligence has been in a great measure anticipated by that brought by the Hindostan; but, as it is almost impossible to separate, in so confused a mass, the new from the old, we shall give the narrative of events furnished by our Bombay correspondent, in their usual connected form.

The satisfactory news from China, informing us of the ratification of the treaty with this country, and of the arrangement of the tariff, was not certainly known at Bombay at the date of the departure of the last mail. The Canadian Parliament was opened on the 28th ult., by Sir C. Metcalfe in person, who, in his address, made a feeling allusion to the death of his predecessor, and the respect paid to his remains by the people of the United States.

Scinde was tranquil, and likely to continue so, unless it be disturbed by any measures ordered from London in consequence of the dates brought by this some blind partisans sent to England from Bombay. Sir C. Napier had thus far regulated that conquest. The troops were healthy.

Under the date of the 26th of August we have the subjoined letter from our Bombay correspondent:—

"The affairs of Scinde appear to be settled, for the British now remain under disturbed masters. Sheer Mahomed, the whole is a man of but little capacity, having failed in all his enterprises, has fled to the Belooches mountains, west of the Indus, from whence it is said that he and his partisans still contemplate attacking some of the posts of the line of British troops forming the Indus. Ali Mahommed, a young man of talent, and a relative of the ex-Ameer, made an attempt to maintain his own territory against the usurpation of his uncle, Mourad Ali, who has contrived, by various means, to get the troops in favour of the British, and to aggrandise himself at the expense of all the other Ameers. But Ali Mahommed has been routed by his uncle Mourad Ali, and he has also fled to the mountains, where he has joined the partisans of Sheer Mahommed. It is said that, after the rainy season, the various hill tribes bordering on the plains now subject to the British, and to Mourad Ali, will be induced to make inroads, and to try to plunder the settlers, but it does not seem expected that they will risk any battle for the expulsion of the British. The fact of the possession of the Indus has produced a powerful effect in India, where the party most dissatisfied and most addicted to disturbance—viz., the Mahometan soldiery of Mahommedism, who always looked to the Afghans, and other invaders from the westward, as the means of driving away the British—are now obliged to admit that their boasted co-religionists of the Afghan mountains have become dependants on their own wretched resources, which were hitherto regarded as unassailable from India. The moral effect of the conquest of Cabul, Ghuznee, Candahar, and Khelat, is very great. India Mahommedanism has sunk into the law of bondage, and say that it is fate that compels them to submit to the infidels."

From Lahore the news is that Dhyan Singh was induced once more to make submission to his master Shere Singh, and that he told him that it was unbecoming in a King to be so fond of the bottle and of the chase. Shere Singh was pleased with the return and submission of his vassal and minister, made him some presents and restored him again to favour, but intrigues were stated to be at work to deprive Dhyan Singh of influence, and they were regarded as likely to bring about fresh commotions in Lahore within a short time.

Various rumours current respecting the state of Affghanistan, where Dost Mahomed is said to be going with a [illegible] and who has sought and obtained the assistance of the treacherous Akbar Khan and the Ghilzais. The Bombay Gazette says:—"It is idle to give credit to the statements circulated at the state of Herat, which is now said to be governed by the influence of Persia. Sultan Jung, the son of Shah Soojah, is described as in prison at Candahar. The fact, the whole of Affghanistan which is left to its own rulers presents a picture of confusion and anarchy.

The state of Gaulior continues the same. The usurper holds the power. the people are oppressed, and in the utmost misery, yet they cannot have any relief; for, as no collision has taken place with the British authorities, there does not seem any probability of any interference on their part with that Government. The troops are, however, on the alert in the neighbourhood of Agra, but, whether for the purpose of entering Bundelkund, which is yet only half settled, or of interfering in Gaulior, or of attacking the Nepaulese after the rains, or of being ready to march into the Punjab, nothing appears to have been known

Lord Ellenborough was at Barrackpore, near Calcutta. He was feted by the military. As Governor-General of India, he has appointed Mr. Bird to be Deputy-Governor of Bengal, a measure highly applauded, as he was himself less occupied with details.

The news from China is to the 26th of June, and contains, therefore, nothing which has not been anticipated by our advices received by the Hindostan.

A most extraordinary discovery was effected in July last, at Bombay, of a confederacy for plundering ships, and receiving goods. The extent to which it had existed for at least a quarter of a century in the most populous part of that town. They are also supposed to be connected with the pirates and murderers who even now so frequently infest the coasts within almost sight of the palace and other authorities of that important naval station. No discovery was ever made of the gang until one of the accomplices gave a clue which led to the seizure of their books, and to the development of the whole system, which was organised in the most perfect manner. The police were on the traces of the malefactors, but it was feared that no conviction would take place, as most of the police agents had been bribed by the gang, and they were throwing every obstacle in the way of having any of their accomplices punished.

It is said that Sir Henry Pottinger has offered to the Imperial Commissioner one of the large steamers to convey him to Nankin, which offer has however been courteously declined.

On Friday morning the 23rd inst., a little before seven o'clock, the Honourable Company's steamer Akbar, bearing the flag of the Commissioner, made her appearance in Victoria Bay, when a salute of fifteen guns was fired by the steamer, and the Chinese flag hoisted on board, it having been arranged that on this occasion his Excellency should be received with the same honours as those usually paid to the representative of her Britannic Majesty. On reaching the deck of the vessel, a guard of honour of the 55th Regiment presented arms; Colonel Malcolm and Commodore Pepper, R.N., received in attendance to conduct him to the quarter-deck. At the same time the personal flag of the Commissioner, bearing, in large characters, the inscription—" The Viceroy of Nankin, appointed by the Emperor," was substituted at the fore-royal mast-head for the one previously flying, the smaller flags being tastefully displayed round the vessel's stern, immediately behind where Ke ying was seated.

During the time the ship was under way, Keying inspected the various parts of the steamer, with which he seemed much pleased especially on witnessing the apparent ease with which the engines performed their work, and the beauty and perfect order of the (to him) most complicated parts of the machinery occupying the engine-room.

The agreeable occupation of early saluting the war junks as the steamer passed, and the inspection of the Royal Marines, it is to be hoped, will not be looked on for the first time), together with the associations which they were calculated to call forth, appeared to have so occupied his mind, that on being shown the infant colony, he expressed surprise and pleasure at the rapidity of the improvement, and forthwith commenced to scrutinise the appearance of the town.

Boats being in immediate attendance from the flag-ship and Agincourt, his Excellency proceeded on shore, accompanied by Ewang and the Tartar general.

From the Hong Kong Gazette Extraordinary, June 30)

PROCLAMATION.—Victoria, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, to our trusty and well beloved Sir Henry Pottinger, Bart., Knight Grand Cross of the most Hon. Order of the Bath, Major-general in the service of the East India Company, and Chief Superintendent of the Trade of our subjects residing to and from the dominions of the Emperor of China, greeting:—Whereas, by certain letters patent under the Great Seal of our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, bearing even date herewith, we have made provision for the government of our colony of Hong Kong and of its dependencies, now know you, that we, reposing especial trust and confidence in the prudence, courage, and loyalty of you the said Sir Henry Pottinger, of our especial grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, have thought fit to constitute and appoint, and do hereby constitute and appoint you, the said Sir Henry Pottinger, to be Governor and Commander-in-Chief in and over our said colony of Hong Kong and its dependencies, and of all forts and garrisons erected and established, or which shall be erected and established within the said colony, for and during our pleasure. And we do hereby require and command you, the said Sir Henry Pottinger, to do and execute all things that shall belong to your said command and the trust we have reposed in you, according to the several powers and directions granted or appointed to the Governor of our said colony of Hong Kong and its dependencies, in and by the said recited letters patent bearing even date herewith, and the instructions under our signet and sign manual accompanying the said letters patent, or according to such further powers, instructions, and authorities as shall from time to time, or at any time hereafter, be granted or appointed you, under our signet and sign manual, or by our order in Privy Council, or by us through one of our principal Secretaries of State. And we do hereby require and command all officers and ministers, civil and military, and all other the inhabitants of our said colony of Hong Kong and its dependencies, to be obedient, aiding and assisting to you the said Sir Henry Pottinger in the execution of this our commission, and of the powers and authorities herein contained. In witness whereof, we have caused these our letters to be made patent. Witness ourself, at Westminster the 5th day of April, in the sixth year of our reign. By the QUEEN herself. EDMUNDS. THE INFORMATION.—CHARGE OF PERJURY.

A great sensation was created in Dublin on Friday last by the announcement that Mr. Barrett, proprietor of the Pilot newspaper, and one of the parties implicated in the Government prosecutions, was to attend at one of the police-offices, for the purpose of swearing information for alleged perjury against Mr. Frederick Bond Hughes, the gentleman engaged by Government to report the proceedings at the Clontarf meeting, and the subsequent meeting in the Royal Association.

Early in the forenoon Mr. Barrett appeared before Mr. Porter and Mr. Magee, two of the Magistrates of the Head-office of Police, to prefer the charge. He was accompanied by Messrs. M'Donogh, and Ryan, and Mr. John Caldwell, as his solicitor. Several of his friends accompanied him, amongst whom were Mr. John O'Connell, M.P., Mr. T. M. Ray, Dr. Gray, Mr. Steele, &c. Mr. Mahony, Mr. J. O'Connell, and Mr. Hamilton, attended Mr. Hughes.

It appeared that the error into which the gentleman specially commissioned by the Crown to make a report of the Mullaghmast meeting, in the affidavit which he subsequently made, and on which the prosecutions are founded, the parties were fixed swore that at Mr. Barrett was present at the meeting, that he delivered a speech; and that in the course of that speech he introduced a number of sentences charged to have been spoken by Mr. Duffy, and they did not know where to find him. The further consideration of the case was then postponed until next day, on Saturday the parties again appeared before Messrs. Tyrrell, Hitchcock, and Callaghan, the magistrates before whom the acts were again stated. Mr. Kemmis, the Crown solicitor, appeared to oppose the application. After hearing both sides, Mr. Hitchcock said, in the present stage of the proceedings he thought it would be better to wait till the informations pending against Mr Barrett had been decided; for it was not in accordance with the course of law for the prosecuted party to be called on to give his explanation until the trial on the evidence, till the first charge had been decided. Besides, they could bring these informations to Judge Burton, who had taken Mr Hughes's informations. He should, therefore, think it advisable to refuse the application.

It was stated that bills of indictment for perjury against Mr. Hughes would be sent up to the Commission Grand Jury during the past week; and that, in the event of their being thrown out, it was the intention of Mr. Barrett to apply to the Court of Queen's Bench for a mandamus, to compel the magistrates for College-street Police-office to receive his informations against Mr. Hughes

It was also stated that Mr. Steele intended to prosecute Mr. Barrett to apply to the Court of Queen's Bench for a mandamus, to compel the magistrates for College-street Police-office to receive his informations against Mr. Hughes

Yesterday, at the Corn Exchange, Mr. Barrett attended to make his information sworn by Mr. Hughes, he had stated that Mr. Steele, at the Corn Exchange, spoke the following words —

"——Behemoth—biggest born of earth.—

Upheaved its vastness"

the fact being that Mr. Steele had not spoken this poetical quotation at all; for being in the habit of furnishing reports of his own speeches, he inserted the lines in question, and had never uttered them. Mr. Hughes, nevertheless, had put it in his informations as if he had heard it spoken.

An adjourned meeting of the Repeal Association was held on Tuesday, in the Conciliation Hall. The Rev. Mr. Tierney presided over the proceedings the gentleman who attended as reporter for the Government took his seat immediately in the rear of the reporters' table, in consequence of the gentlemen of the press having refused to allow him to remove to the table just among them. Inspector Mahon, of the metropolitan police, having entered the room, and taken a seat at the desk set apart for the Government reporter, Mr. O'Connell, at the request of the Chairman, requested him to remove from the table of the house. Mr. Mahon immediately left the place, and took a seat at the left of the chair. A committee was appointed to take measures for getting up addresses to the Queen, begging her Majesty to dismiss her present Ministers.

An inspection of pensioners took place on Monday at the Royal Hospital, Kilmainham. The men were arranged in three classes, and the names of those fit for service are to be returned to Government immediately.

The Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council of Ireland have fixed on the 13th of November as the day on which the Irish Arms Act is to come into operation.

The last account from the wreck of the Columbia on Seal Island, states, that so wonderfully strong was the ship, that only her rudder and stern had fallen away, although she been on the rocks more than two months, and exposed to all the vicissitudes of the weather REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—MEETING IN CONCILIATION HALL.—The usual weekly meeting of the Repeal Association took place on Monday last, in the newly-erected edifice called Conciliation-hall. Owing to a very general rumour that the Government intended to prevent the opening of it, a great number of persons assembled at the Corn Exchange rooms, to learn if there were any verification of the terrible report, but were, no doubt, much gratified to hear that it was quite unfounded. Mr. O'Connell read a long communication from Mr. W. S. O'Brien, M.P., in which that gentleman set forth his reasons for becoming a convert to repeal principles. The document was ordered to be printed, and a copy to be sent to every Member of Parliament. The chief object of Mr. O'Connell's speech was to inculcate peace and unwilling obedience to the laws. The amount of rent for the week was announced to be £2,284 5s. 6d., and the meeting adjourned until next day.

By the last accounts from Ireland we learn that it is not the intention of the Government to continue the prosecutions against the Repeal agitators on Mr. Hughes's informations.

SCOTLAND.

THE FREE CHURCH GENERAL ASSEMBLY.—GLASGOW.—The Assembly met on Saturday at eleven o clock, but the sitting was not open to the public. Object under discussion was the state of the finances of the Church. Pursuant to notice, a meeting was held in the Assembly Rooms, of the heritors, elders, and other lay friends of the Church, the Marquis of Breadalbane in the chair. The large hall was completely crowded, and great interest appeared to be excited by the proceedings. The Hon. Fox Maule, M.P., read an address to the brethren of the Free Church, and to Scotland at large. [The address referred in strong terms to the sacrifices made by the Free Church clergy, and strongly inculcated the necessity for extraordinary efforts being made to raise subscriptions on behalf of the Sustentation Fund.) The Hon. Gentleman concluded by saying, I have a double motion; first, that an address shall be adopted, and that our chairman be instructed to sign it, in name and by authority of the meeting; and, in the second place, that for the purpose of setting it before the public in as perfect a state as we can, we now refer the document to a committee, to consist of our Noble Chairman, Mr. Monteith, Mr. Dunlop, Mr. James Fraser, Mr. Spears, and myself, to be put into as perfect a form as possible, and to use all fair means for its circulation. (Loud cheering.) Sheriff Monteith seconded the motion. The motion was unanimously agreed to, and on the motion of Mr. Fox Maule, Mr. William Campbell, Mr. Collins, and Mr. James Ewing, were added to the committee. Mr. Macgill Chalmers then moved, and Mr. Hunter seconded a resolution of the like length, which was loudly cheered; and, thanks having been given to the Noble Marquis for his conduct in the chair, the meeting separated.

THE RIOTS IN ROSS-SHIRE.—One of the ringleaders in the Raskeen rioting was, through the activity of Mr. Finlayson, captured, and lodged in Tain gaol. The man Holm, an elder of the Free Church, and a ringleader in the previous breaking of property, has also been apprehended, and bailed out by his friends. The great bulk of the culprits still keep aloof. Mr. Jardine, the sheriff, still remains to superintend the measures necessary for securing the public peace, and setting the rioters, many of whom are wandering for shelter apart from their families and friends.

SURREY SESSIONS.

(Before Mr. T. Puckle, Chairman, and a Bench of Justices.)

On Tuesday, Thomas Lloyd, a venerable-looking old man, 67 years of age, and of respectable connexions, was indicted for feloniously stealing, at Kingston-upon-Thames, a glass mustard-pot, and a corn-spoke, the property and money of Mr. Henry Batson, a retired Captain of the First Life Guards. The prisoner was defended by Mr. Charnock, whose cross examination of the gallant prosecutor afforded abundance of merriment to a crowded court, in which the bench most heartily joined. The following amusing colloquy took place:—Mr. Charnock. Pray Mr. Batson, what are you?—The witness (in a very pompous tone). Come, come, none of that. let's have no insolence if you please. (Loud laughter.)—Mr. Charnock: I ask you, Sir, what are you?—Witness: And I tell you, Sir, I will have none of your insolence, or you shall take the consequence.—Mr. Charnock. Well, Captain, I'm not frightened, but I think you are a little choleric.—Witness: I know how to chastise insolence.—The Chairman: Mr. Batson, the Court will take care that no insolence be shown to you, but put to you, presently you may answer the learned counsel.—Mr. Charnock: You will now perhaps answer my question, and tell the Court what you are.—The witness (greatly irritated): What am I? Why, I am a gentleman.—Mr. Charnock: Oh, a gentleman of independent fortune, and that's more than can be said of you. (Roars of laughter.)—Mr. Charnock: Well, the jury will be the best judges of that.—The witness: What have they to say with the usages of gentlemen? Hm. moderate laughter.)—The Chairman: Perhaps, Mr. Batson, the best plan would be to answer the question.—The witness (deliberately folding his arms and looking fiercely at the learned counsel): Why, Sir, what do you want of me? Mind what you say.—Mr. Charnock: Oh, pray don't be in a passion. I want neither guns nor pistols. You can't speak daggers, but use none." (Laughter.)—Witness. Oh, never mind about that; you have not been used to the company of gentlemen.—Mr. Charnock: But as to your profession?—Witness: I profess nothing; on the contrary, you profess a great deal. (Laughter.) I am a soldier, and now what are you?—Mr. Charnock: You have this advantage of me, you are a gentleman and I am not; but will you condescend to tell us your rank in the army?—The witness: I hold no rank at present—Mr. Charnock: What was your former rank? Come, we shall get on at last.—The witness: Oh, no doubt, when you are not insolent. (Laughter.) I was a Captain in the 1st Life Guards, and sold out.—Mr. Charnock. How long ago?—The witness: Thirty years. What do you want to know? Charnock: Nothing. I shall not trouble you for your "travelled history."—The witness: And if you did you would not get it. —Mr. Charnock: Perhaps not; but still we must have the history of the felony.—The witness: And you will learn it in the indictment. I thought lawyers were quick witted, and knew everything without asking. (Roars of laughter.)—Mr. Charnock: Well, Captain, the law and the army don't agree, and so I must leave you. A soldier would be rather dangerous.—After a little further sparring between the learned advocate and the gallant captain, this amusing cross-examination dropped, and the gravity of the court was no longer disturbed. The jury found the prisoner "Guilty," but strongly recommended him to the mercy of the Court on account of his extreme age, in which the gallant prosecutor most heartily joined. The prisoner was sentenced to twenty-one days' solitary confinement in Horsemonger House of Correction.

Peter Hutchinson, aged 21, and John Jones, aged 17, both old offenders, having several times been convicted, and spent the greatest portion of their time in the various gaols of the metropolis, were found "Guilty" of stealing on the 16th of last month, spoons, the property of Mr. George Crutchly, of Rose Villa, Camberwell. The prisoners are well known as two of the mostexperienced "are sneaks" in London, and, according to the testimony of the officers, were in the constant habit of "hunting in couples."—The court sentenced them to seven years' transportation each.

Mary Dawes, aged 37, a good looking female, of highly respectable connexions, was indicted for feloniously stealing, on the 23rd of September last, at St. Saviour's, the Martyr, Southwark, a piece of silk, the property of Messrs. Oxley, silkmercers. Mr. Charnock appeared for the defence. The case was a very clear one, against the prisoner. It appeared that on the day named in the indictment, the prisoner went to get another piece out of the window, the prisoner took the opportunity of stealing a roll of silk, value £5, and secreted it under her cloak. The piece of silk was immediately missed, but the prisoner was allowed to depart from the shop, after which she was taxed with the robbery, and the silk fell on the shop floor from under her cloak, upon the discovery of which a policeman was immediately sent for. The prisoner then fell on her knees, entreated forgiveness, and said she was a lady, offered to pay for the silk, and said a prosecution would be her ruin.—Mr. Charnock, the prisoner's counsel, said that he could not struggle with such a case as the present. All he could do was to state the story of the lady under the care of which, for it could not have been for want, and therefore the prisoner had no earthly excuse to offer. It was a well-known fact that shopkeepers were plundered to an enormous extent, and their daily losses were incredible, and they required every protection the law could give them; the Court was therefore determined to punish this class of offenders with severity. The learned chairman said the only benefit he could give the prisoner was that she was not known, and therefore he would consider it as a first offence. The prisoner was sentenced to six months' imprisonment and hard labour, at Brixton, the last fortnight in solitary confinement. The prisoner, on hearing her sentence, fainted away, and had to be carried down stairs from the bar.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

(Before the Recorder.)

James Alexander Simmons, a well-dressed young man, who surrounded in Court on a charge of misdemeanors, was indicted for uttering and publishing, by false pretences, nine gold and silver watches, value £85., the property of T. C. Bell. Mr. Clarkson conducted the prosecution. The prosecutor is a watchmaker in Lombard-street, and the defendant called upon him and represented to him he wanted some watches to send to Leipsic fair, and he picked out nine, the value of which was the sum mentioned in the indictment, and it was arranged that half the amount should be paid down, and the remainder by a bill at six weeks. Eventually, however, the prosecutor allowed the defendant to take away his property upon his paying £5., and promising to bring the remainder in the evening, which he never did. The prosecutor after this brought an action against the defendant to recover the amount, and he was defeated in that proceeding by the defendant pleading and proving that he was a minor at the time of the occurrence, and the present case was adopted by the Jury. The Jury found the prisoner to be of opinion that under such circumstances the charge of fraud could not be sustained, and accordingly returned a verdict of "Not Guilty"

THE COURT OF BARONS.—This Court was soon as the judges (Mr. Justice Maule and Mr. Justice Wightman) entered the Court on Wednesday morning. Mr. Wilkins rose on the part of Mr. Vallance, the solicitor to the Duke of Brunswick, to make the judgment of the Court upon the defendant, Bernard Chaining, who had pleaded guilty to an indictment for libel.—Sergeant Shee, who appeared for the defendant, opposed the motion. He said the defendant had been indicted,

Bench, and the [illegible] circumstances of the case. He (Sergeant Shee) appeared as [illegible] gery, and made the fullest and amplest reparation, by apology and explanation, expressing the defendant's great regret that he should have done anything to wound the Duke's feelings and had assured his Serene Highness that nothing of the kind should occur again. The application which he (Sergeant Shee) had now to make was, that as there was another case of libel against the defendant, coming before the Court of Queen's Bench, the whole matter should be heard in that Court, and that their lordships, whom he now had the honour to address, would give good enough to respite the judgment of this Court until an application could be made to remove the whole matter into the Court in Queen's Bench by a writ of certiorari.—Mr. Wilkins opposed this application, and said his resistance, he thought, would be well founded. First, his learned friend had stated that this indictment was preferred previously to the criminal information to which he had alluded. The defendant had, some two sessions ago, pleaded guilty to the present indictment; and after due deliberation, and with the advantage of his learned friend's assistance, he did, on that occasion, think proper to express his regret in a manner which argued something like a consciousness of his guilt: and he (Mr. Wilkins) could have wished that nothing had transpired since to alter that opinion. But the affidavits which had since been put in were not at all consistent with that expression of regret, but repudiated the plea which he had made, so as to render it a perfect nullity, and contradict everything he had previously said. He (Mr Wilkins) had, last session, asked the judgment of the court, and the only thing which there had been to justify the delay in passing judgment, was that the learned judges had expressed their opinion that the Duke of Brunswick had a right to answer the defendant's affidavits, and said that they would rather the affidavits in both cases (the Duke's and Mr. Vallance's) should be before them previously to their giving judgment. Whether, under the circumstances, the defendant's conduct was to be considered in mitigation or aggravation, their lordships would determine. After expressing regret and contrition, he had continued his libellous attacks on the parties.—Sergeant Shee: No, no.—Mr. Wilkins: And the counsel who had so had taken upon him to convey indirect submissions (a very customary practice with gentlemen of that learned profession) was, he (Mr. Wilkins) was sorry to say, Mr. Justice Maule ultimately decided to take time to consider whether he should consent to the present application or not, and said the decision would be given when the judges came down to this court (to fix the assizes for Lancashire next year) on Thursday week.—Mr. Vallance was in the court, but the Duke of Brunswick was not present.

NEW COURT

Elizabeth Allyne, alias Talbot, alias Cox, a young female, very genteelly dressed, surrendered to take her trial on a charge of stealing a silver-mounted pukstaff, value 10s., the property of Miss M. Pashaw.—Mr. Ballantine appeared to prosecute on the part of the prosecutrix, and Mr. Clarkson appeared for the defence.—[The case has been several times before the public under the head of "Police," on her examination with a person who called himself the Right Hon. Adolphus Talbot.]—It appeared by the evidence that the prisoner had been seduced from her respectable husband and home by the delusive artifices of the ci-devant right honourable, who, in order to carry on his predatory system more effectually, he represented as his wife.—It further appeared that the magistrate followed her to be enlarged on bail, and in consequence of her condition her husband had forgiven her, and taken her under his roof, and had accompanied her to the court.—Mr. Ballantine was about to call witnesses to the utter infamy of the character, but the Common Sergeant interposed and said it was unnecessary, as there was no proof that the prisoner stole the article.—The jury then acquitted her, and she departed in company with her husband, and commenced a new life.—The learned judge said that on this day's list was a prisoner named Thomas Adolphus Talbot, who had been alluded to during the trial just terminated, and he applied to the Court to have his trial put off, as, from what had passed, he was aware that the prisoner's bias might exist against him in a certain quarter.—The Common Sergeant granted the application, and it was ordered that the male prisoner should not only be tried before another jury, but also before another Court.

(Before Mr. Justice Maule.)

On Thursday, on the application of Mr. Prendergast, the counsel for the prisoner Jennings, the case of slave-trading was postponed; but the trial of Mr. Zulueta is expected to take place during the present session.

A post-office clerk, named Thurgood, who was tried for stealing money out of letters, was acquitted, on the ground of insanity, which appears to have become the universal plea for every species of crime. The prisoner was ordered to be detained during her Majesty's pleasure.

BOOT STEALING CASE.—During the course of the morning the Grand [illegible] returned a true bill against Isaac Bridgman and George Waite Bridgman, for felony. The prisoners stand charged with breaking open the tomb of the late Thomas Ghorst Tawney, situated in the burying ground of a chapel in Walworth, of which chapel the defendant Isaac Bridgman is the minister, and stealing therefrom the coffin and the body of the said Thomas Ghost Tawney. In returning the bill, the foreman of the Grand Jury stated to the court that the Grand Jury considered it as their duty to report that Mr. Tawney, the son of the deceased, and the prosecutor in this case, had stated that the cause had offered to have restored to him the skeleton of his father, if he would withdraw the prosecution.

(Before Mr. Justice Wightman.)

HIGHWAY ROBBERY.—William Hermitage, an athletic young man, was indicted for assaulting Thomas Barton, on the 16th of the present month, at Kensington, putting him in fear, and robbing him of one sovereign, his property. The prisoner was found guilty, and sentenced to fifteen years transportation.

Thomas Adolphus Talbot, alias the Hon. Thomas Adolphus Talbot, alias Thomas Elliot, was indicted for felony, on the 16th of August last, at Kensington, various articles of jewellery and other things, to the value of £90, the property of Owen Henry Passage. Mr. Wilde addressed the jury on behalf of the prisoner and called several witnesses to speak to the prisoner's good character. Mr. Justice Wightman summed up. The jury found the prisoner guilty, and Mr. Justice Wightman deferred passing sentence. There was another indictment against the prisoner for stealing property from other parties under similar circumstances, but on a different day, which was not proceeded with. The prisoner, who is rather a genteel looking young man, with moustachios, laid his handkerchief over his face until the whole of his trial, and appeared, when he left the small degree, the degraded situation in which his own misconduct had placed him. It is but just to the police concerned in apprehending the prisoner, to say, that large sums of money were offered to them to forego the prosecution, but without success.

POLICE.

On Wednesday, a young fellow named John Young, known to the police a what is called a "regular out-and-outer, was brought before the Lord Mayor, charged with having professionally examined the pockets of several gentlemen. The prisoner was stated to have adroitly dipped his hand into some of the pockets. He walked along, as not to cause the least suspicion or sensation in the owners. He was, however, observed by a policeman, who knew his capabilities, and took him into custody. He had on the cover of his handkerchief between his waistcoat and shirt when he was apprehended, and the policeman produced the following letter, which was found in his pocket.—"Brixton. Dear John,—You promised to meet me when my time's up. I go out next Monday week, and hope to be merry and clever? The Lord Mayor: But who are you? In what business are you engaged?—Prisoner: I work for myself in jobbing about, and I can turn my hand to anything it don't signify to you. The Lord Mayor: Who is your friend, John Wheelan?—Prisoner: He is no friend of mine. The Lord Mayor: Why, he addresses you from the treadmill, and he calls you "Dear John." That is very friendly of him, at any rate. (A laugh.)—Prisoner: He may do that without being a friend of mine If a man has to send a letter to your lordship he can write it. I dare say he'd call you "Dear John," but I don't suppose you'd think him a friend for all that. (A laugh.)—The Lord Mayor: Well, you are a clever fellow; but it is hard that you reject the honour Mr. Wheelan has done in his phrase. He concludes it by saying he is "Yours faithfully," another proof of friendship, and he no doubt expects to meet you at the top of the lane. (Laughter.)—Prisoner: I know nothing about him—nothing to the world. The Lord Mayor: You are one of the Swell mob, I find, and must seven o'clock, because his time will be "up" a couple of months before ours. (Laughter.) Prisoner: I have done nothing. Why should I be sent to crib for seven months?—The Lord Mayor: Where did you get those handkerchiefs?—Prisoner: I just bought them in Field-lane.—The Lord Mayor: Policeman, was his face or his back towards Field-lane when you saw him?—Policeman: His face, your lordship.—The Lord Mayor: You are going to make a long journey in a field-lane, my good fellow. You get things of this kind much cheaper than you could buy them there. You shall go to Bridewell for two months.—Prisoner. Well, let me have my handkerchiefs, at any rate. I bought them. It's ——hard that a person can't purchase a rag of a wipe without being charged with stealing it.—The Lord Mayor: The handkerchiefs shall be adver tised, and you can write an apology to your friend at Brixton from your cell prison in Bridewell, where you shall remain faithfully "ours" until your time is "up." (Laughter.) The prisoner was committed to Bridewell.

On Wednesday, the police benches, being so early as 9 o'clock, were crowded, in consequence of the examination of a man named Edward Dwyer, who was charged with the wilful murder of his own child, a male infant, three months old, on the preceding night. The prisoner is about 27 years of age, is a very well made man, and obtains a livelihood by hawking brooms and other articles about the streets. He is well known at this court, and has been frequently in custody before, on charges of assault, but has never been charged with any offence of the kind, on a summary conviction, by Mr. Cottingham, for biting a piece out of a man's cheek. As mentioned in another part of this day's paper, the prisoner, after an irritating quarrel with his wife in a public house, in Tooley-street, dashed the child's head with all his force against the counter, by which it was killed. The coroner's jury returned a verdict of wilful murder against the prisoner, who was committed by the magistrate to take his trial on the capital charge. It did not appear that the prisoner was drunk.

MARYLEBONE.—STRIPPING OF A FEMALE IN HYDE PARK.—On Tuesday morning, about six o'clock, Police-constable Turner, 39 D, received information that a suicide had been committed in Hyde park; he proceeded thither, and near Albion-gate, the spot to which he had been directed, he discovered a female quite dead, lying under a tree, around the following extraordinary circumstances:—The

THE GREAT QUADRANGLE, TRINITY COLLEGE.

THE great curiosity excited by the allusions which our morning contemporaries have made to the visit of Queen Elizabeth to the university, of Cambridge induces us to think that a brief account, condensed from the most authentic records, at this moment of visitation to the same classic and time-honoured seat of learning and piety by our present gracious Queen, will not prove unacceptable to our readers; and it will accordingly be found in a previous page. We now proceed to the details of the visit of her Majesty Queen Victoria:—

THE ROYAL PROGRESS

On Wednesday morning at precisely 20 minutes before 8 o'clock, Her Majesty entered a pony carriage and four, and left the Quadrangle of Windsor Castle for the railway stational Slough. In the carriage with Her Majesty were his Royal Highness Prince Albert and their Serene Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Hohenlohe Langenburg.

In the second carriage were the Countess of Mount-Edgecumb, (the Lady in Waiting on her Majesty) and the Hon. Eleanor Stanley (the Maid of Honour in attendance upon the Queen).

Earl Delawarr (the Lord Chamberlain), who arrived at the Castle on Tuesday evening; Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. Charles Grey, Equerry in Waiting on Her Majesty; Colonel Bouverie, Equerry in Waiting on the Prince; and Mr. G. E. Anson, his Royal Highness's Private Secretary, followed in a third pony carriage and four.

Her Majesty was escorted to Slough by a detachment of the 1st Regiment of Life Guards, under the command of Sir Charles Kent.

Upon Her Majesty alighting from the royal carriage at Slough, the Queen and his Royal Highness were received by Mr. C. Russell, M.P., the chairman of the Board of Directors of the Great Western Railway Company; Mr. Saunders, the Secretary; and Mr. Brunel, the engineer in chief. The usual preparations were made at the station for the accommodation of Her Majesty and the Prince Consort. The platform between the Queen's reception-chamber and the state carriage was covered with scarlet drugget, and over that was a splendid crimson velvet carpet embroidered with fleur-de-lis.

The engine attached to the state carriage was driven by Mr Brunel, who was accompanied by Mr. Gooch, the chief superintendent of the locomotive department.

At the time of Her Majesty's departure from Slough the weather, which had been exceedingly gloomy and wet during the early part of the morning, suddenly cleared up, and by the time of her arrival at Paddington there was every appearance of a favourable day.

From the Paddington terminus of the Great Western Railway the royal cortège, escorted by a detachment of the Life Guards, proceeded at a very rapid rate across the Regent's Park, and through Camden-town, towards the direct road to Cambridge. It consisted of three of the royal carriages and four, with outriders. Owing to the uncertainty in which the public were as to the exact route which her Majesty would take at this part of her journey, no time had been afforded for any such preparations as were made at the chief towns and all along the road, from the near neighbourhood of the metropolis to Cambridge; but the inhabitants of the suburbs through which the royal party passed, poured out in crowds to welcome her Majesty, and cheered her heartily, especially in the more populous parts.

The first place at which relays of horses had been provided was the Manor-house, in the neighbourhood of Tottenham, and at a distance of six miles from town.

The road out of town in this direction is remarkable for the evidences it affords of the opulence of its inhabitants. The wayside is studded with the residences of persons who are evidently well to do in the world. Along this line her Majesty and suite passed at a rapid pace, but not so rapidly as to prevent her from receiving the cheers and affectionate congratulations of the inhabitants as she passed along. Of course, it is needless to say that there was not a living soul in the place who was not on the qui vive to behold the Queen; not a window was unoccupied, nor any available point for viewing the royal party unappropriated. Many vehicles belonging to the neighbouring gentry—and in this part of the neighbourhood of London there is scarcely a person of standing who does not keep something of the kind—were drawn up on the roadside as her Majesty passed, while others endeavoured, with more or less success, to keep up with the cortège.

In the town of Tottenham, throughout the whole distance of the road, flags and banners were flying. At the Tottenham-cross a large quantity of evergreens were hung, and a very elegant triumphal arch, formed in festoons of laurel and other evergreens, across the road. Fronting the White Hart was another triumphal arch of evergreens. There were several private carriages on the sides of the road, and crowds of persons on the footpaths, by whom the Queen was repeatedly cheered. Over the Angel-bridge, Edmonton, the Union Jack, and other flags were displayed, and the bridge was covered with evergreens. The Royal cortège reached the New Inn, Waltham-cross, about ten o'clock, where there was a relay of horses ready, and they were soon placed in the Royal carriage. In front of the New Inn was a large Royal standard, and an arch was formed of laurel and other evergreens, sufficiently large entirely to cover the Royal carriage, which remained under it while the horses were changed. Here her Majesty had presented to her a book, containing the history of Waltham-cross, which was graciously received. At this point the Life Guards were relieved by an escort of the 13th Light Dragoons. On leaving the New Inn, the postboys were directed, on passing "the Waltham cross," to go slowly, in order that her Majesty might have a view of that ancient monument, erected to the memory of Queen Eleanor, but owing to this not being placed in an open and exposed spot, the carriage was taken on some distance before it was seen. The postboys twice attempted to turn back, but were impeded by the great body of persons collected, when the cortège proceeded on its journey. The "Cross" was decorated with the Royal Standard and a variety of evergreens. There were other displays of loyalty in the town, and a the turnpike, which divides the counties of Herford and Middlesex, were two splendid Royal banners. The scene at Waltham Cross is represented upon our first page.

From Waltham-cross the Royal cortège passed on at the rate of 14 miles an hour towards Ware.

At many points along the route the country people had assembled in great numbers to welcome her Majesty, and they greeted her with loud and hearty cheers—marks of genuine unsophisticated affection. At many of the cottages by the wayside the humble inhabitants had procured green boughs to deck their habitations in honour of the Queen. Her Majesty seemed pleased with these marks of attention.

THE NEW BRIDGE, ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE.

As the royal cortège entered Ware that place presented a very animated appearance. The good people of the town (or village) had made every preparation which their facilities allowed in order to welcome her Majesty. At the entrance to the town, just where the road winds round to the right, a triumphal arch had been erected, covered with evergreens, which presented a very pretty appearance. In front of this arch, facing the London road, a large crowd had assembled, who shouted a welcome as soon as the royal carriages with their escort appeared in sight. As her Majesty passed through this arch the cheering from a vast crowd of people, who thronged the road and lined the streets, was most enthusiastic. The whole population of the place seemed to have poured into the streets, and the windows, which were adorned with flags, green boughs, and many devices, were lined with anxious spectators. About the middle of the town there was another arch of the same kind, and again another at the other end on the road to Cambridge. There were also two other arches in the centre of the town, apparently erected by private individuals. Many of the houses were decorated with evergreens and flags, and the ladies at the windows waved their handkerchiefs most enthusiastically.

At Ware the escort of the 13th Light Dragoons which had accompanied her Majesty from Waltham-cross returned, and she was attended onwards by a party of the Scots Greys, under the command of Cornet Sir George Hampson, Bart.

From the Bull at Ware to the Bell at Buntingford the distance is 10 miles. At the latter place much preparation had been made. There were no less than three triumphal arches here also—one across the road at the bridge over the river Lea, at the entrance of the town; another across from the Bell Inn to the Grammar-school, opposite; and a third at the other end of Buntingford on the road to Royston. In front of the centre arch the boys of the Grammar-school, attended by the master of that school, the Rev. Mr. Bishop, were ranged in rows by the wayside. They cheered to the top of their little voices, and waved small flags of red, and white, and blue, as she stopped at the Bell Inn (the posting-house), where she changed horses and alighted for a few minutes. As there had been no notice of her intention to alight no special preparation had been made. A band had been provided to welcome her Majesty, which they did by playing the national anthem in very creditable style. The inhabitants of Buntingford mustered in crowds to see the Queen, and cheered her most lustily.

At this place, in addition to the arches erected by the townspeople, another was erected across the street, from the St. George and Dragon Hotel, by no less important a body than the "Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of the Manchester Unity, Earl of Durham Lodge. Across the road, suspended from the arch, was a large flag, bearing the words "The Odd Fellows' welcome to Queen Victoria and Prince Albert." Not content with this private and special demonstration of loyalty, the same body of "Odd Fellows" formed themselves in line on either side of the road opposite the Bell, where her Majesty changed horses, and cheered the Queen very heartily, an exhibition of enthusiasm which was very graciously acknowledged. There was scarcely a house in the town of Buntingford that was not decorated with boughs, and many had flags. Here also, besides the usual force of the A division which attends the Queen on her excursions, there was a strong body of the Herts constabulary force, under the superintendence of Inspector Brady, by whose excellent arrangements the utmost order and decorum were preserved. Shortly before ten o'clock a body of the A division of police arrived by a special coach. They had come by train in the morning, and were to proceed to the Earl of Hardwicke's, at Wimpole, to stay there while her Majesty remained.

From Buntingford to Royston another detachment of the Scots Greys, under the command of Cornet Pilgrim, escorted her Majesty, the other detachment remaining at Buntingford.

From Buntingford also, a troop of the Herts County Yeomanry, commanded by Captain Heathcote, followed her Majesty on the road to Royston.

Her Majesty's horses had been ordered at Buntingford for half-past 11 o'clock,

"Of all?"

"Of all. I have not—Why how, how is this? Darnley!—what am I to understand?"

"That I'm amazed!" replied Darnley, recovering himself somewhat, for he conceived that she was still merely testing his sincerity—amazed at the treachery of whom you must have been the victim."

"But what are your feelings towards me now?"

"What they ever were, dear Caroline!—what they ever will be."

"Still unchanged?"

"And unchangeable."

"Oh, happiness!" cried Darnley—dear Darnley, I have indeed proved that you love me now. Here am my hand of my heart you have long been the master. I feel that we shall be happy, Darnley—oh! most happy, and that notwithstanding the sad reverse, our union will be one of pure joy. Had I the wealth of worlds I would lay it at your feet, but we will not let the absence of it mar our felicity. With you I could live in the humblest style! You have expectations, and so have I. You have an income, and although I have not, my father will assist us—I am sure that he will. Bendez, Darnley, I am his only child unprovided for now."

"But how," said Darnley, who began to imagine that the thing was getting rather too serious—"how could they act aside that will of which you gave me the copy to read?"

"It was set aside, Darnley, by a subsequent will—a will by which Sir Arthur bequeathed all his property to his nephew, leaving me utterly penniless."

"Is it possible?" cried Darnley.

"Possible!"

"Caroline, seriously, is that the fact?"

"Darnley! you cannot imagine that I have not been serious? You surely cannot think that I have been jesting?"

"Why, I certainly did think that you were!"

"Oh, you fancied then that I was trying you merely—trifling with you—bringing you to the test? Why—how is this?"

Darnley was silent.

"I perceive," she continued, looking earnestly at him, "you did think so; you did not believe that I had been thus dispossessed of all, and now that you know it to be the fact, you'll desert me!"

"No! Lady Cleveland. No!"

"Lady Cleveland! The change from 'dear Caroline' into 'Lady Cleveland' is great. Answer me this one question, Darnley," she added, with the view of being sure that she was correct in her conjecture; "answer but this—Will you, as I am, marry me to-morrow?"

"Why," he replied, in a faltering voice, "you know that my means are extremely limited."

"Limited as they are, I am content to share them, and will do all of which I am capable with the view of promoting their increase."

"But—I—really—it requires some little consideration."

"Enough. I see. It is so. This is your sole for me alone! I have proved it: the test you selected I have applied. Oh! that I had been merely jesting—but as it is, I leave you, sir, with feelings of unutterable contempt."

"But, Lady Cleveland, be assured—"

"I am assured that in leaving you I leave a heartless villain."

Whereupon she scornfully dashed from the room and quitted the house with a bosom swelling with indignation.

"Now," she exclaimed, on re-entering the coach, "now do I begin to see my error; and but now, when too late, when all is lost! Caught by my own snare of deceit! Fool that I have been, to have faith in so perfidious a wretch! What strange infatuation is that which prompts a woman to love one who would dishonour her! Let me not think of it. For him what would I not have done! what would I not cheerfully have endured! But 'tis past; and now what is to come? How am I to act? Heaven!" she ejaculated, fervently clasping her hands, and wearing a fearful bitterness, "Heaven! guide a wretched ruined creature without a hope!—without a friend!"

Instantly after this scene had been enacted, a scene of a somewhat different character was performed at the house of Dr Hawtree.

The success of Fred, as the tutor of Alice had become so manifest—her mind had become so much more cheerful, her appetite so much improved, and her spirits so much lighter—that the Doctor—who was overjoyed to see his loved child, of whose recovery he has almost despaired, restored to health—was desirous to reward Fred; permission to touch upon the period when his engagement as ace preceptor for life should commence; and as Fred was not exactly the sort of person to enter into so nice an affair of this nature, he had no sooner obtained that permission than he proceeded to take advantage of it aptly.

"Alice," said he, having prudently put her in excellent spirits, for Fred was a fellow of infinite tact, "are you fond of courtship?"

"Am I fond of courtship."

"Are; do you like it? Does it suit your complaint?"

"What complaint?"

"Does it agree with you, in a strictly constitutional point of view?"

"What a very odd question! I don't understand it. You droll creature, what do you mean?"

"I mean that if courtship agrees with you, it does not agree now with me. At first, it is true, I thought it very delightful. Oh, I was in raptures with it;—nothing could surpass the pleasure it induced; nothing could, in my view, be even remotely comparable with it! But now I've grown tired of the business—it doesn't suit my constitution at all."

"You had better let papa," said Alice, "prescribe for you in that case."

"He has never—has gave me the prescription exactly an hour ago."

"Oh, indeed!"

"And what do you think that prescription is?"

"Nay, how is it possible for me to tell? What can his prescription be?"

"Matrimony!"

The neck and face of Alice were crimson in an instant.

"And now," continued Fred, "I wish you to tell me when I am to have this prescription prepared?"

"Indeed I know nothing whatever about it."

"Nor do I. I am curious to know—exceedingly curious. It is a mixture—it is a mixture? I suppose it is: well, we'll call it a mixture of love and joy—which I now begin to feel extremely anxious to take!"

"You speak so mysteriously."

"It is a mysterious affair! However, I'll speak more plainly: thus—Alice when are we to be married?"

"Oh," said Alice, archly, "but that is such a very blunt way of putting a question of this character. I suspected that you would have done it in a much superior style—there's no beauty, no poetry at all in it."

"Teach me then how you would like to have it done."

"Nay, I cannot teach you, for you have seen it done in a very different manner"

"On the stage you mean? Oh! I'll do it in that way with pleasure! Now then, keep your seat and look as composed as you can, for I'm quite embarrassed—as possible. Hem!" he added, kneeling before her, "Bright angel!"

"Oh, now you are going to the other extreme."

"Not at all! Oh! that's nothing. Dull angel wouldn't sound well, and angel is perfectly legitimate. Charles calls Lucrece his angel constantly, even before me!—how much he improves upon it when he addresses you! Now you have you to imagine me as—as—Bright angel! here be individual!—(nay, you must not laugh) adorable creature!—(dot of your eye. Oh, how I love that dot!) fascinating as the fair and exciting of the B. Y. winning chaiz) adorned a brilliant spectacle to an unusually large and fashionable company. The races continued throughout the week, and were run off with a laudable degree of punctuality, terminated in ample time for the special train "Saint Mondegrets" to get home without hurry or fatigue by half past ten.

PERTHSHIRE.—On Monday a foot race, which created much interest in the sporting circle, came off at Darley, between Aitchison of Lochearnhead and Bland of Dorlin. The match was made for £50 a side—the men to run 100 yards on a turnpike road. Any one received £5 from Bland for conceiving to the match, being decided at Derby. In the betting Aitchison was backed at 6 to 4, and the Londoners speculated their money very freely. The ground having been measured at Langley Bennie, Duncrub, gates out and in. The old "condemned" horse, driven by its owner, started off beautifully from the Dumb Bell, and performed the 3 miles 37 minutes. Bland, who is a complete "rum 'un," made a laudable effort. The old 'un was so fresh the last mile as at starting, and had scarcely turned a hair. During the distance the horse broke four times, and thus caused a delay of between three and four minutes. His owner has offered to back him to trot in harness 15 miles in the hour.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Notwithstanding the receipts of English wheat up to Mark-lane, since our last report, have been reasonably extensive, and of superior quality, the demand for that description of grain has ruled very firm, and the prices have advanced from 1s to 2s per quarter, at which nearly or quite the whole of the supply has been disposed of. In foreign wheat not much business has been transacted, and the quotations have remained unvaried. Malting barley has sold freely, at full currencies, but the value of grinding and distilling parcels has been with difficulty supported. The malt trade has proved extremely inactive, on rather easier terms. From the comparatively small supplies of oats on offer, they have produced from 6d to 1s per quarter more money. Beans, peas, and flour are quite as dear.

ARRIVALS.—English: Wheat, 2330; Barley, 1480, Malt, 1150; and Oats, 1060 quarters. Flour, 4110 sacks. Irish: Wheat, ——; Barley, ——, and Oats 23,010 quarters. Foreign: Wheat, 1990; Barley, 1060, and Oats, 880 quarters

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 42s to 44s; ditto white, 45s to 46s; fine ditto white, 46s to 48s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 42s to 43s; ditto, white, 5 s to 47s; rye, 34s to 36s; grinding barley, 24s to 28s; distilling, 29s to 30s; malting ditto, 34s to 36s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 46s to 52s; brown ditto, 46s to 48s, Kingston and Ware, 56s to 62s; Chevalier, 62s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 17s to 21s; potato ditto, 19s to 23s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; ditto white, 19s to 20s; thick beans, new, 34s to 36s; ditto, old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 38s to 40s; white, 30s to 34s; boilers, 32s to 37s per quarter Town-made flour, 45s to 52s; Suffolk, 38s to 42s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, 50s to 58s. Dantzig, red, 40s to 42s; white, —— to ——. In Bond.—Barley, 23s; oats, new, 14s to 15s; ditto feed, 14s to 15s; beans, 30s to 32s; peas, 32s to 34s per quarter. Flour, America, 22s to 24s, Baltic, 25s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—We have had very little doing in any kind of seeds this week, at about former quotations.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing 38s to 40s; Baltic, crushing, 39s to 40s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 36s to 38s; Hungarian, 35s to 40s per quarter; coriander, 10s to 12s per cwt; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s, white ditto, 10s to 12s 6d; tares, 5s to 7s 6d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, £30 to £37s per last of ten quarters Linseed cakes, English, £10 to £10 10s; ditto foreign, £7 to £7 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, £5 5s to £6 per ton; cleanly, 7s to 8s per quarter

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 9½d to 10d of household ditto, 7d to 8d per 4lb loaf

Imperial Average Prices of Grain, Flour, &c.—Wheat, 50s 1d; barley, 30s 4d; oats, 17s 0d; rye, 29s 10d, beans, 30s 8d, peas, 32s 8d.

Imperial Average of the Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 50s 7d, barley, 30s 7d, oats, 18s 0d; rye, 30s 1d, beans, 30s 6d, peas, 32s 8d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s, barley, 8s; oats, 8s; rye, 12s 0d; beans, 10s 6d; peas, 10s 6d.

Tea.—The public sales of tea—which have comprised upwards of 20,000 packages, and brought to a close the 4 quarterly sales—have been well attended by the trade. Out of the quantity brought forward, about 20,000 packages have been actually disposed of. Common and middling congous have gone off at a reduction of 1d to 1½d, and twankays 1d to 2d per lb. In other kinds no alteration has been noticed.

Sugar.—This market has ruled firm since our last report, but without a large amount of business having transacted hat. Fresh lots have been freely supported.

Coffee.—The improvement lately noticed in the demand for, and prices of, coffee, has now taken place. In the sales which have been made, a steady tendency has prevailed, and lower rates have been generally accepted, though not to any material extent.

Tallow.—The market is in a quiet state, but prices are not lower. P.Y.C. on the spot, is sold at 47s 6d; and for forward delivery, 47s 3d per cwt.

Oils.—There is very little doing in any kind of oils, and the rates are with difficulty supported.

Hops.—We have a large quantity of new hops offering, yet the demand for them is steady, on the following terms:—New Sussex pockets, 100s to 110s; Weald of Kent do., 110s to 120s; Mid Kent, 120s to 130s; and East Kent, 130s to 190s, per cwt. The duty is estimated at from £130,000 to £135,000

Wool.—The large sales of Saxony, Silesian and other wool are still in progress, so far as they have proceeded, the biddings have been brisk, at an advance of 1d to 1½d per lb. on the currency of the last auctions.

Potatoes.—We have had a large arrival of potatoes in the pool this week, while they have gone off steadily, at from 4l 2 10s to 5l 10s per ton.

Coals.—Monday, 15s; Hebburn Main, 17s 6d; Clarke and Co., 17s; Gosforth, 20s 6d Hilda, 19s 6d, Killingworth, 20s; Lambton, 20s 3d; Stewart's, 21s 9d; Caradoc, 21s 6d; Adelaide, 21s per ton.

Provisions.—Although the demand for Irish butter is heavy, the late improvement in the quotations a well supported. Foreign is dull, and has declined in price quite 2s per cwt., the best Dutch selling at 95s to 98s. The arrivals of bacon are large, yet prime qualities find buyers at 56s to 62s per cwt. landed. In other kinds of provisions very little doing.

Smithfield.—The supplies of fat stock having been more than equal to meet the wants of the buyers, the general demand has proved inactive, at barely extreme prices. Beef, from 2s 6d to 3s 10d; mutton 2s 8d to 4s 4d; veal, 3s 4d to 4s 4d, and pork, 2s 10d to 3s 10d, per 8 lbs, to sink the offal

Newgate and Leadenhall.—Prime mutton has sold freely, other kinds of meat slowly, on the following terms:—Beef, from 2s 4d to 3s 4d, mutton, 2s 8d to 4s; veal, 3s 4d to 4s 4d, and pork, 2s 4d to 3s 8d per 8lbs. by the carcase. ROBERT HERBERT

The commercial intelligence received by the overland mail of the last publication is again satisfactory. The mail from Bombay brings letters from that place to the 8th of September, and from Calcutta and Madras they are of corresponding dates. Trade throughout our Indian possessions was gradually becoming more and more cheerful, and the stocks of British goods, previously nearly unsaleable, had at these dates been materially reduced. In this quarter, therefore, a steady demand for the usual quantities of our manufactures is gradually unfolding itself, and during the last week it has caused increased activity in all our manufacturing districts. From China, by this mail, no letters have been received so late as those were by which we alluded to in our last number. From the United States of America, and from the various rising communities on the great American continent, letters of late date have been received, and general reports from all of them continue to be cheering. In the United States considerable improvements in trade are visible, and the general aspect of affairs in the Republic of Mexico is one of hopefulness. Of debts is now considered unfavourable to the interests of the citizens, and some of them already are beginning to recommend national honesty as the best policy. In the meantime, the demand for British goods continued to be considerable, and the stocks were not large. As, however, the summer had been the chief importer, fair prices were made, although the prices were rather less than those which were realised during the corresponding period. The share-market, however, in the beginning of the week, there was rather a lively demand for the shares of the leading railway associations, and an advance in the price of some of them was the necessary consequence, particularly in the Eastern Counties, Northern and Eastern, and in those of the London and Birmingham. On the Royal Exchange last post day, the supply of bills drawn at sight was rather limited, and that at usance, but still it was to a mean equal to the demand, and the rates of the exchanges continue in favour of a further influx of money into the country.

As to the course of the week's operations in the Money market, the demand for money for commercial purposes rather increased than otherwise, and a tendency to increased rates of interest, in consequence, was manifested. Government and trustees' securities are becoming more aggressed, although not to yet to that extent which admits any general advance in the money quotations until next month. The leading rate of discount to Five per Cent per annum, according to the character of the Bills to be converted into cash. On the Stock Exchanges, likewise, both English and foreign, the demand for Stock is rather improved than otherwise, as the total descriptions of British Stocks were 1 per cent. dearer than they were in the beginning of the week. In Railway shares, also, activity continued to be exhibited amongst the dealers in these descriptions of property, and prices sustained gradually to get dearer, until the end of the week caused the Money market. London and Birmingham stock shares realised 2 per cent. more than at the commencement of the week, and those of the Manchester and Glasgow line have been purchased at the same period, to any amount, under only 2 to 3 per cent. higher. London and Brighton, Midland Counties, and North Midland, were also generally from 2 to 3 per cent dearer than they were in the commencement of the week's operations, and a similar observation may be applied to the shares of the North Eastern, and to those of the Eastern Counties. In Spanish securities some speculations were entered into; and prices of the Three per Cent. Bonds advanced nearly one per cent. in consequence. On the whole, the money market continued in a healthy and sound state from the beginning till the conclusion of the week.

H. MEYER and Co's PATENT ELLIPTIC LAMP, 126, Piccadilly, London. This Lamp has now been before the public upwards of three years, and in no instance given dissatisfaction. It is used by a great number of Noblemen and Gentlemen, and in several of the first Club Houses and other large Establishments, in consequence of their having given it the preference. It burns 10 hours with one pint of oil per gallon, at given a light equal to sixteen Wax Candles. It is perfectly shadowless, on the principle of the French Carcel Lamp, but without its complicated Mechanism. H. M. and Co. will have great pleasure to allow a Month's trial, previous to any purchase being made

NO. 8, LUDGATE-HILL.—TEAS CHEAPER.—The reduction of duties from Canton ports, and the gratifying intelligence, that the quality of the tea is materially improving, much greater attention is being paid to its culture, and the blessings of peace, so earnestly desired, and so auspiciously cemented, are pregnant with the happiest results to the commercial welfare of both countries. Sampling canons of the forthcoming season's teas had already arrived, the crop was stated as abundant, and the leaf in the highest condition. The imported this present year is considerably greater than many former, and above an average supply. We are therefore enabled to announce the gratifying result, a choice stock of splendid qualities from 2s. to 4s. per lb. cheaper. The advantages which unusual sales for cash enable us to command, the purchases having been years maintained upon the markets as extensive buyers, together with the celebrity acquired from excellence of quality, enable us to offer the above reductions to the lowest prices rarely to be met with. Our desire for upholding the character we have earned for choice selected goods, will only be equalled by our determination to act upon the smallest remunerating profits.—SIDNEY and HALL, Dealers and Importers, 8, Ludgate-hill.

PORTRAIT OF PROFESSOR WHEWELL, IN "THE GOLGOTHA," ST. MARY'S.

before noon, the Queen and Prince Albert close their visit and go to town, and from thence to Windsor. There is but little probability that the Queen and his Royal Highness will go to Burghley, to visit the Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter, although reports have been circulated that they would most likely honour that fine old mansion by a brief sojourn.

We annex a characteristic portrait of the highly distinguished Master of Trinity College, from a sketch by a subscriber at Cambridge, the accompanying biographical memoranda having been obtained from another source.

Professor the Rev. W. Whewell is a native of Newcastle. He was admitted a member of Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1812, and was Second Wrangler in 1816; he also obtained the Chancellor's Medal for poetry in 1814. He was, soon after his degree, elected Fellow of Trinity, and was from that time, till his appointment to the Mastership of the College in 1842, by Sir Robert Peel, chiefly employed in the tuition of the students. Professor Whewell is the author of several works, which have gained for him a very high reputation. He was selected by the Bishop of London to write the "Bridgewater Treatise on Astronomy," which is one of the most popular contributions to the series.

Among Mr. Whewell's important works, too, are his "History and Philosophy of the Inductive Sciences." His mathematical treatises are numerous; and he has contributed many valuable papers to the Transactions of the Royal Society, and of the Cambridge Philosophical Society. Professor Whewell is also an active member of the British Association for the Advancement of Science. Our sketch represents the Rev. Professor in his favourite attitude in the "Golgotha," a gallery appointed for the Masters of Colleges, &c., in Great St. Mary's (the University Church), during the prayer introductory to the afternoon sermon.

Our next illustration represents one of the "lions" of Cambridge, the magnificent Telescope, given to the Observatory by the present Chancellor, his Grace the Duke of Northumberland. It has an object glass of 11½ inches effective aperture, is equatorially mounted, and 20 feet focal length, by M. Cauchois, of Paris. This splendid instrument is contained in a building with a revolving dome, near the Observatory.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

CURIOUS CUSTOM AT RIPON.

In the ancient borough of Ripon, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, a singular custom has been observed, it is stated, from the time of King Alfred to the present day. Every night, on the cathedral clock striking nine, a cow's horn is blown thrice opposite the residence of the mayor, and once opposite the Market-Cross. The origin of the practice is thus explained in Gent's history of the place.

"It was the custom of the vigilarius, or wakeman, to order that a horn should be blown, every night, at nine o'clock; and if any house or shop was broken open and robbed after that blowing of the horn, till the rising of the sun, why then the loss was obliged to be made good to the suffering inhabitant. For this obligation, or insurance, every householder used to pay a groat a year: but if there was a back door to another street, from whence double danger might be supposed, then it was to be two groats. That tax is since disconnnued, but still they persevere to blow the horn at the said hour of the night, three times at the mayor's door, and thrice (now once) at the Market-Cross."

CURIOUS HORN AT RIPON.

The above is a faithful representation of the horn, copied from the original, which is richly mounted with silver, and the belt is ornamented with a shield, bearing the name and year of office of several wakemen and mayors. The first bears date 1526. The spur and cross-bow, attached to the belt, were presented by King James I. to the corporation.

This interesting custom is characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon times, when the whole community was called upon to aid in protecting life and property; and the spirit of this system, though the spirit is no longer applicable to the existing state of society, still characterises this department of our institutions.

ELECTRIC EELS AT THE ADELAIDE GALLERY.

Two gymnoti electrici, or electric eels, have lately been received at the Gallery of Practical Science, in Adelaide-street, Strand, and must be considered a very interesting accession to the exhibition. A very fine specimen was shown here about three years since, but, after being frequently experimented with, this eel sickened and died. From the specimen above engraved, the reader will perceive that the gymnotus differs essentially in form from the representations common in popular works on natural history, in which it too closely resembles the common eel. The colour of the body approaches puce, the fins being transparent and nearly colourless.

The gymnotus inhabits the rivers of South America, and differs in some points from the torpedo. The electrical apparatus is diffused throughout the whole of the structure of the eel, which will be found, in almost every portion of its external appearance, to resemble very closely the common eel. The fluid which lubricates the apparatus is contained in cells, and not in prisms; and these are a congeries forming organs, four in number, two on each side of the body. These organs do not receive their electricity from the eighth pair of nerves, but there are 224 pair of nerves issuing from the spinal marrow, which give it off. The shock produced by both is nearly similar, and is much the same as that ordinarily exhibited by the usual means. These shocks are capable of magnetizing needles, of decomposing water, and of affecting the galvanometer, and the spark has been obtained from them. The shock is more severe from the gymnotus.

THE ELECTRIC EELS AT THE ADELAIDE GALLERY.

Humboldt experienced a most dreadful shock, that affected him during a whole day, gave him a violent pain in the knees, and shook every joint, in consequence of his placing his feet upon an eel that had just been taken from the water. The power of producing these shocks is voluntary, and appears to be used both as a means of defence, and to disable its prey.

THE COLOSSEUM.—This building has at length found a purchaser in Mr. Montague, brother of the City Surveyor. The price, it is said, is under £25,000, although in its palmy days Mr. Braham paid for it £40,000. Mr. Stanfield, our native and successful artist, with Bradwell, of Covent-garden Theatre, are in league with the purchaser to produce the finest pictorial exhibition on record. It is to succeed the great panaure of London, and will occupy Stanfield a whole time and attention for nearly twelve months. The Conservatory, the Swiss Cottage, in short, everything, is to undergo an entire change; and it is no longer doubtful that the Colosseum, under this new proprietorship, will be the most attractive place of amusement in the metropolis.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE'S PALACE AT RUMPENHEIM.

RETURN OF H. R. H. THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE FROM THE CONTINENT.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge left Rumpenheim, on the 18th instant, and travelled by route of Frankfort, Mayence, Aix-la-Chapelle, and Brussels, to Ostend, where his Royal Highness arrived on Saturday, the 21st instant, and passed the night, embarking the following morning, at eight o'clock, in the Beaver steam-packet for Dover. On landing, his Royal Highness went to the Ship Hotel, where he slept, and took his departure for town on Monday morning.

Rumpenheim is situate on the river Maine, five miles from Frankheim, situate on the river Maine, and about five miles from Frankfort. It belongs to the Princes of Hesse Rumpenheim, a branch of the reigning family of Hesse Cassel, to which electorate, as well as the kingdom of Denmark, the Heir Prince (Erb Prinz), about to be married to the Princess Alexandria of Russia, is heir presumptive.

The Duchess of Cambridge is a daughter of this house; and her Royal Highness, as well as the other members of her family, are bound, under the will of her father, to take up their residences here occasionally. The Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and family, the Duchess's sister, the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg Strelitz, together with her son, the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburg Strelitz, and his youthful bride, the late Princess Augusta of Cambridge, have lately been staying there.

Schloss Rumpenheim is very pleasantly situated half way between Frankfort and Hanau, but approached by a ferry. It commands a lovely view of the valley of the Maine and the Taunus mountains. Exactly opposite is Bergheu, the scene of a severe conflict between the French and English in the seven years' war.

The members of the Cambridge family are deservedly popular, and may often be seen, like ordinary people, walking and shopping in Frankfort. There is an anecdote current of the Princess Augusta, which shows her off in very amiable colours. Some two or three years back, upon a previous visit here, her Royal Highness happened to enter a shop in Frankfort, and found there, ineffectually attempting to purchase some articles, a travelling John Bull and his wife, neither of whom understood either German or French, nor could the shopkeeper speak English. The Princess stept up to their relief, and by dint of a good deal of persuasion, managed to reduce the article to something below half the price laid upon it, and perfectly satisfied them that the charge was altogether correct. The good couple thanked the Princess with great warmth of feeling, and expressing an earnest wish for a better acquaintance, demanded her name. Her Royal Highness laughed merrily, and said that they, perhaps, might have heard of "Augusta of Cambridge;" a dénouement which created some confusion.—From a Correspondent at Frankfort.

THE DUC DE BORDEAUX AT EDINBURGH.—On Sunday last the royal duke attended worship in the Catholic Church, Broughton-street. In the course of the day, M. Guillerez, Professor of French, had the honour of being presented to his Royal Highness, and delivered an appropriate poem or song, splendidly adorned with the royal arms and fleurs de lis. His Royal Highness was greatly pleased with this mark of respect from one of his own countrymen, and expressed his attachment to Scotland, and the happiness he at all times felt in seeing a Frenchman.

SIR JAMES SHAW, BART., LATE CHAMBERLAIN OF THE CITY OF LONDON.—This worthy baronet died on Sunday night in the 80th year of his age. He was born at Riccarton, in the county of Ayr. His family, though highly respectable and honourable, were in circumstances too confined to allow scope for the enterprising spirit of their numerous offspring, and James, with his brothers, quitted at an early period their paternal home to seek advancement under more favourable auspices. James, by diligence, integrity, and thrift, graduated from the lowest seat in the counting-house of an eminent mercantile firm in the City, to the distinguished position of a partner in the house. In 1798 he was elected by the inhabitants of Portsoken, the ward in which he lived, to the civic office of alderman. Thence he became sheriff, and in the year 1805 he was elected Lord Mayor. During the year of his mayoralty Mr. Shaw received several marks of personal regard from his Majesty George III., seven of whose sons dined together at one of the Lord Mayor's splendid entertainments at the Mansion-house. In 1809 his Majesty was pleased to confer upon Mr. Shaw the dignity of a baronet. Sir James continued to discharge the duties of alderman with scrupulous impartiality and unvarying punctuality until the year 1831, when, upon the decease of Richard Clarke, Esq., he was elected to the lucrative and honourable office of Chamberlain of London, which office he continued to hold until he resigned in May last.

THE NELSON TESTIMONIAL.—Her Majesty the Queen Dowager having most graciously consented to bestow her very distinguished patronage upon the projected entertainment to the Greenwich pensioners, has forwarded a donation of £20. Earl Nelson has also sent five guineas for the same purpose, together with subscriptions from the undermentioned officers:—Admirals Sir Davidge Gould, £3 3s; Sir George Martin, £3; Dundas, £3; and Joseph Bullen, £2. The subscriptions come in more rapidly, now that the public begin to perceive the truly national object of the undertaking, and they there is a certainty of its being carried out; but in consequence of the incomplete state of the works in Trafalgar-square, and the inclemency of the weather at this season—it being far too cold to bring the old tars from their more comfortable quarters—the committee have resolved to postpone the dinner, which will take place in the open air, until the 2nd of April next, on which day the glorious battle of Copenhagen was gained.

SCENE FROM THE OPERA OF "THE FAVOURITE," AT DRURY LANE THEATRE.

There are no scenic artists who manage their lights, or, more technically speaking, their media, so well as the GRIEVES; this is the more to be observed where there is a mixture of the artificial with the real:—

> When slanting moonbeams 'thwart the silo'e sad gloom,
> Give way, or mingle with the glaring torch,
> And make most doubtful hues as the forces
> Procession it to midnight mass!

In morning hours—the alba of the morning, also, their art is peculiarly felicitous;—there is a breathingness, a respirable atmosphere, about their works, which cannot be surpassed by any other artists. Of W. Grieve we would say in particular—

> His genius loves the cloister and the tow'r,
> Bemantled with Time's garment—ivy; dark,
> Sa'e when Selene glisteneth its leaves,
> And silvers them with her pellucid beam.'

The scène represented in the accompanying wood-cut is the last in the opera, and very much reminds us of a more beautiful one, painted by the same artists, some twelve years ago:—we mean the cloisters in "Robert le Diable," at her Majesty's Theatre, during the lesseeship of Mr. Monck Mason. Though there is a vast and incongruous assemblage of architectural ornament in the present instance, which, in some degree, hurts the eye, yet the artist may be defended in the use of it, inasmuch, as, at the supposed period of the piece, Gothic, Morisco, Arabesque, &c., with the remnants of the classic styles, were all confused together in heterogeneous disorder. The scene, however, is well imagined, and, in the ensemble, beautifully painted.

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE

By HENRY COCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "VALENTINE VOX," "STANLEY THORN," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE TEST, AND THE QUESTION PROPOSED.

NO sooner had Carolina entered the coach than she burst into tears. Her passion had been too towering, her pride too lofty to allow her to weep before them, but now she wept bitterly and freely, and continued to weep, not only during the whole of that evening, but throughout the night.

What was to be done? Unconscious of the noble generosity of Charles—unconscious of the proposal he had made with so much promptitude—the question occupied the whole of her thoughts, and as she painted the position in which she then stood, and the circumstances by which she was surrounded in the darkest conceivable colours, it was a question which, while she considered it thus, drove her almost to distraction.

There are moments when death appears preferable to life—when existence seems scarcely supportable—when the imagination, startled by the thousand stages in which present troubles are made to appear, prompts the thought of leaping from all our miseries to "where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest;" at such moments, judgment and courage combined, can alone avert suicide—judgment to perceive that the horrible shapes which we cause our troubles to assume chiefly spring from a disordered imagination, and courage to bear up against those troubles which invariably present a far less formidable front when boldly and firmly opposed. This courage, happily, Caroline possessed, and while it imparted strength to her judgment, which was then but imperfect, it enabled her to spurn the idea to which her mind had given birth. No! although struck from the high position she had occupied—ruined as she conceived herself to be, and left comparatively destitute—she resolved not to sink beneath the weight of her calamities, but to show that although they had broken her fortune they could neither break her spirit nor deprive her of hope.

She had hope still; and that hope was centred in Darnley. She loved him; and that he loved her she fondly believed. With him she might yet be happy. The style in which she had lived, it was true, would be absent, but what was style when compared with that joy which to her as his wife, could not fail to be present! She would go to him at once: he might call at her late residence—her late residence—and perhaps be insulted! She would go. she would explain all. nothing should be concealed from him: he would respond to his expressions of unalterable love, that they might for the present contemplate together that prospect of bliss which rose brightly before her.

In pursuance of these resolutions she dressed herself immediately after breakfast, and repaired to the residence of Darnley. He was at home; and although he felt amazed when she sent up her card, he received her with unmingled demonstrations of delight.

"Dear Caroline!" he exclaimed, "for, as my own dear Caroline I now must address you, I could not have dreamt of this happiness. But," he added, in an anxious tone, as he tenderly led her to a seat, "you do not appear to be well! you look faint!"

"I am not quite well," she replied.

"Have those wretched people been annoying you again?"

"They have, indeed."

"When I am privileged," he playfully rejoined, "I shall scold you, if you allow yourself thus to be annoyed by persons whom you ought to regard with contempt. Despise them!—spurn them!—treat them with scorn! Do not suffer their malice to triumph! I would not, if I were you, permit them to vex me!"

"Alas!" returned Caroline, "I cannot prevent it."

"Then place me at once in a position to protect you. I cannot effectually do so now: but then let the creatures attempt to annoy you, if they dare! You have now the power to place me in that position: exercise it, therefore, dear Caroline, for your own sake as well as for the sake of him who adores you, whose every hope dwells in your smile, whose heart and soul will ever be devoted to the attainment of your happiness, and who, rather than see you endure an hour's pain, would sacrifice his life."

Darnley!" said Caroline, with an intensity which startled him, "are you sincere?"

"My dearest love! devise any test by which my sincerity can be tried, and I will cheerfully submit to it. Sincere! Is it not a cruel question? Does it not imply a doubt? And can it be possible for any doubt on this subject to be entertained by you? You know that I am sincere."

"I believe you to be so"

"Be sure of it—prove it at once. To-morrow let our happiness be perfected."

"To-morrow!"

"Ay, even to-morrow. The marriage can be private—perfectly private. The world would be in ignorance of the fact. None, save those in whom we may confide with safety, need have the slightest knowledge of it. Therefore, sweet Caroline, let us say to morrow."

"Darnley," said Caroline, with strong emotion, "you are—without dwelling upon to-morrow—content to take me?"

"Content! content is far too poor, too cold a word. Say rather that I shall be in raptures—"

"To take me—as I am?"

"What could impart to me purer delight?"

"To take me—without the slightest reference to wealth?"

"Who can hope to possess a richer treasure?"

"Whatever I may now declare, Darnley—whatever it may be—your fate it will not change—you will not desert me?"

"Desert you! Never! No power on earth can ever turn the current of my love from you."

"Not even were I poor?"

"Say that you are poor—no change of feeling can be induced by that. Say that you have not a shilling: I love you for yourself alone. Wealth is not my idol. Tell me that you are destitute—"

"I am destitute—utterly destitute—destitute of everything on earth! Treachery has done its work! Of all, Darnley—of all have I been deprived. Heaven!" she exclaimed, as Darnley shrank back as if he had sustained an electric shock. "Am I deceived! Darnley! Speak to me!"

but the royal party did not arrive until about five minutes past 12. About ten minutes elapsed while her Majesty alighted, and they then proceeded, amidst the cheers of crowds who were assembled in the streets, and of the inhabitants of the houses who thronged the windows and waved their handkerchiefs, at a rapid pace towards Royston. At Chipping and at Buckland, roadside villages, preparations had been made in proportion to the means of the humble inhabitants to welcome her Majesty. They festooned their houses with flowers, and hung them with evergreens, and assembled on the roadside in considerable numbers to cheer the Queen as she passed, which they did with right good heart. At the Red Lion, at Read Mill-hill, a concourse of country people had assembled They stood on an they were to be seen, and what with the green boughs they waved, and the hedges they had donned for the occasion, they formed a striking and picturesque feature in the view from the hill.

On the other side of the hill an accident occurred which, though fortunately un attended with any serious results, might have cast a damp on the enthusiasm of the day. It has already been mentioned that a troop of the Herts County Yeomanry attended her Majesty from Buntingford to Royston.

Commanding the Read Mill-hill, Serjeant-Major Pascoe, who had been one of the most active of the troop, was observed to real on his horse and presently to fall on the road, his horse going nearly full speed at the time. He is a very bulky man, and so he fell.it was at first supposed that he had pitched on his head. The third carriage of the royal cortège, containing the Hon. Mr. Anson, Colonel Bouverie, and two ladies of the court, was advancing at a short distance behind where the trooper fell. Mr. Anson and Colonel Bouverie, with prompt humanity, jumped out of their carriage, and assisted him to rise. He was at first insensible, but he afterwards recovered, and having been hastily offered the chaise of The Times reporter, who followed the royal cortège, he was conveyed on to Royston, where a surgeon was sent for, who promptly attended, and gave hope of ultimate recovery Sergeant-Major Pascoe is an old soldier, and fought at Waterloo, so that no suspicion of deficient horsemanship attaches to him.

At Royston the inhabitants had also made considerable preparations, as far as the shortness of the notice allowed. A meeting took place on Monday morning for the purpose of making the necessary arrangements. The Earl of Hardwicke came over from Wimpole to attend the meeting, and assist them, so far as his circumstances allowed, with his superior knowledge of etiquette and (possibly) of royal tastes. A considerable sum of money was subscribed on the spot, and triumphal arches were erected in different parts of the town.

The appearance of the town of Royston, as her Majesty approached it, was very striking. At the entrance of the town a large triumphal arch had been erected. It was not of the usual evergreen, but was composed of white and pink flutes columns, and the arch itself was of the same. These colours were contrasted by a beautiful display of evergreens, in lines, which followed the outline of the arch. There were also large inscriptions on the arch—"Welcome, Queen Victoria and Prince Albert; welcome to Royston;—together with banners bearing the names of the Sovereign and her consort, and very handsome flags. The pace of the royal party was slackened as they neared this arch, and her Majesty passed slowly through the town. The reception here was most enthusiastic. Crowds of people lined the road for many hundred yards in front of the arch above described, who cheered her Majesty in the most enthusiastic manner. The greater part of these were persons in a superior grade of life, and by far the greater number had their own vehicles, drawn up by the road side, in which were standing ladies and children, who cheered and waved their handkerchiefs

The whole town of Royston, that is to say, the High-street, through which her Majesty passed, presented literally a canopy of flags and triumphal arches. There was scarcely a house that had not a banner, with loyal inscriptions, hung out. The windows and fronts of the houses were adorned with evergreens and devices. But by far the most cheering part of the display was the enthusiasm of the crowds of people who lined the streets, and filled every loop-hole of vision in the houses. Nothing could be more true and hearty than the reception her Majesty met with here.

At the outside of Royston, on the Cambridge road, there was another triumphal arch, of the same materials as the first, but not quite so imposing. A large inscription on the arch said -"Royston. The Yeomanry greet Queen Victoria and Prince Albert. Beyond this arch the road diverges to the left towards Melbourne and to the right towards Newmarket. Here the escort of the Scotch Greys, which had attended her Majesty from Buntingford, filed off and returned, as did also the Herts Yeomanry; and the Earl of Hardwicke, the Lord-Lieutenant of the county, attended by a troop of his own Yeomanry Cavalry, and also by an immense concourse of the gentry and yeomanry of the county on horseback, met her Majesty, and accompanied her towards Cambridge. At Melbourne her Majesty again changed horses and even here, although the place can scarcely be said to be more than a mere straggling village, the good people had gone to a great expense and trouble to receive her Majesty with due honour, according to their means and station.

Festoons of flowers—houses, or rather cottages, decorated with boughs and evergreens—waggons, and vehicles of a superior order, drawn up by the roadside, crowded with people, the latter kinds decorated with ribands, and the people themselves dressed in all their best—these were the external marks of honour which the villagers provided. But what, perhaps, was more pleasing to the feelings of her Majesty was the heartfelt and enthusiastic welcome they gave her.

From Melbourne her Majesty proceeded at a pace of not less than fifteen miles an hour towards Cambridge. From this point of the journey—indeed, for some miles previously—it would really bear the name of a royal progress. The yeomanry cavalry in advance, the outriders, the carriages in their long array—flanked on the neighbouring district, who kept up with the Queen during the moment that her Majesty entered Cambridgesuire a body and substance was given to the procession, in the shape of hundreds of mounted gentlemen and respectable farmers of harm, and long to preserve your Majesty for the benefit and happiness of these realms.

The following was her Majesty's gracious reply to the address from the university :—

"I receive with peculiar satisfaction, on the occasion of my visit to the university, this dutiful and affectionate expression of your attachment and loyalty. I am deeply sensible of the benefits which your exertions in the cause of religion and learning have conferred upon my people, and the university may, on all occasions, depend upon my continued favour and encouragement.

"To His Royal Highness Prince Albert

"The humble Addresses of the Vice-Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars of the University of Cambridge.

"May it please Your Royal Highness,

"We, her Majesty's dutiful subjects, the Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars of the University of Cambridge, beg leave to avail ourselves of the opportunity now given us, of tendering to your Royal Highness the expression of our profound respect, and of welcoming, with our most cordial wishes, your Royal Highness's appearance within the walls of the university : an event which, in a source of satisfaction and joy to every member of our body.

"The intimate ties which connect your Royal Highness with the happiness of our beloved Queen, and the future prosperity of the Na on, cannot but excite in our most lively desires and earnest prayers for your Royal Highness's welfare, with which your Royal Highness's virtues and high an lowmrns lead us to combine a cordial and respectful feeling towards your Royal Highness's person

"We are persuaded that your Highness's known regard for religion, learning, and science, will make your Royal Highness receive with kind condescension the salutations of a body which has these great objects for its special ends. Your Royal Highness, educated in a distinguished university of your native land, will not fail to feel a lively concern in the academical establishments of this your Royal Highness's adopted country ; and, connected as your Royal Highness is, by the most endearing ties, and by the religious blessings of your exalted position, with the institutions of England, your Royal Highness, we are persuaded, visits one of the ancient universities of the land with a strong interest, arising both from the place which it occupies in the history of the country, and its importance in the social fabric of the empire

"We trust that the attention which in this university has been bestowed upon divine and human learning, has been such, that we are not unworthy of some portion of the sympathy which your Royal Highness feels in the cultivation of such pursuits ; and we rejoice that the delight and gratitude excited by the visit of our gracious Sovereign, are combined with the privilege of coming under the personal notice of your Royal Highness, her Majesty's illustrious consort.

"It is our earnest wish and prayer that your Royal Highness may receive every blessing which Providence can bestow, and may long continue to be a benefit and an ornament to these realms

The following was his Royal Highness's reply :—

"I receive with peculiar pleasure these assurances of attachment and regard which have been so kindly presented to me on this my first visit with the Queen to this ancient university. My warmest and best wishes will always attend the studies here pursued, and I earnestly trust that the University of Cambridge may long maintain the reputation it has earned, of successfully training enlightened men for the service of the state, and diffusing throughout the country the blessings of a sound and religious education."

The following was the order of precedence in which the university preceded her Majesty through the town on Thursday

WIMPOLE HALL, Wednesday Afternoon. Most extensive preparations, on a scale of princely splendour, are in progress for the reception of the Queen and her august consort, who have accepted an invitation, and will honour the Earl and Countess of Hardwicke with a visit of three days. A distinguished party, in point of numbers rather circumscribed, has been invited to meet the Queen, who, with Prince Albert, will arrive, by five o'clock, it is said, to-morrow evening from Cambridge to dinner. A ball will be given in celebration of the Royal visit by the Earl and Countess of Hardwicke, on Friday, (not to-morrow evening as erroneously stated), to which the nobility assembled at Cambridge, and most of the aristocracy and gentry of this and the neighbouring counties are invited, and at least 350 personages of rank and distinction are anticipated to grace the fête. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the Earl of Hardwicke, Hon. F. G. Anson, and a large party intend to go out on Friday morning several hours shooting. On Saturday morning, shortly

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, 23rd Oct., 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—At no time have I been witness of greater activity amongst our fashionable shopkeepers than now reigns in Paris. Your space will not allow me to enlarge upon the whole of the stuffs which are now exhibited here ; I shall, therefore, content myself with giving you a list of those which seem to be most worn by our fair friends. I should say that at this time the principal articles in demand are Scotch plaid cashmeres ; such, for instance, as are usually called the Stuart, the Glasgow, and the Black Douglas. The whole of these tissues are much sought after for home negligé dresses or for morning toilettes. For common home dresses, a strong contension to any particular fashion, Pekins de laine, Derval, or Lucrèce, or Victoria, or O'Connell poplins, both worked and with fancy patterns, are much worn, as are also a description of white Pekin, called the Abd el Kader, and the d'Aumale.

As a general observation, I should say the forms most in use are high, not unlike the cold puritan redingote : the backs are gathered, the sleeves plain, and the accessories are composed of simple puffings, of open jockey, and of double biases. Passementerie also continues to play an important part in our fashions, but it is frequently varied, and set off by gold and silver work, and with pearls, bugles, &c. Do not, however, let me forget to remind you that furs and lace are perfectly indispensable adjuncts to almost all our fashionable creations, and it really would appear that the luxury and elegance which furs and lace confer upon a costume are becoming better understood every succeeding season.

Amongst the various dresses that have struck my fancy, I trust I may be allowed to mention two that appear to me to deserve notice, from their exceedingly good taste and brilliant effect. The first of these was of Spanish grey mohair, trimmed upon the front of the skirt by a row of large silk buttons. The corsage was half high, plain and pointed, with a small pelerine, also pointed in front, enveloping the shoulder to the spring of the arm, and trimmed all round it with buttons similar to those on the skirt : the sleeves were plain, and furnished with a row of buttons throughout their whole length. The second dress was a pink cashmere, which rose considerably above the ankle on the front of the skirt by three small festooned flounces of green silk, disposed en tablier, very narrow at the point of the corsage, but widening towards the bottom of the skirt, and rounded upon the hip where they finish, nearly as far as the half of the breadth. The corsage was plain, high, and pointed, with a triple seam, and having a festooned fall back laid upon the seams of the side, and forming jockeys upon oriental sleeves, which were also trimmed with fall backs, embroidered and lined with green taffety.

As yet you will see, from the tenor of these remarks, that our novelties possess no character of any extraordinary importance. I must therefore recommend you to wait patiently.

HENRIETTE DE B.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

On Saturday last Mrs. Alfred Shaw made her first appearance for the season, in the charming part of Cinderella, and was greeted, most deservedly, as the first of our English vocalists. We were happy to perceive that she had very nearly, if not quite, recovered from the relaxation of throat which so severely affected her at the Birmingham and Edinburgh Festivals : nothing, even considering the previous exertions, could have been more brilliant than given than the finale to the opera—it quite entranced the audience, making them believe she was indebted to the fairy for more gifts than that of the magic slipper. Her performance was truly splendid. The opera was got up creditably, and was followed by the beautiful ballet of "The Peri," which went off with its usual éclat.

COVENT GARDEN

This ill-starred (!) establishment has made another close—the third season (?) being announced to commence on Monday next, October 30. Now, we do not know what all this means exactly, but we wish Mr. Wallack well, and as there is an old saying that there is luck in the third time, we heartily hope it may be his lot to be more fortunate than he has been up to the present from the commencement of his management.

HAYMARKET

A new farce-adaptation from the French was produced at this house, on Monday last, entitled "The Railroad Trip," the reception of which was rather equivocal, and ought to have been decided, for even in its original state it is "but a weak invention of that enemy" to our native dramatic exertion—THE FRENCH STAGE!

PRINCESS

On Monday last an English version of Donizetti's, or, more properly, Lablache's, "Don Pasquale," was most successfully produced at this brow of a house—"glorious Paul" in the part of the Don. To say that he was equal to the great Neapolitan, would be an unjust but one representative as the other, for, although humour abounds to a great extent respectively in the two, the raciness is not "of the same vintage," and fails to please alike the palates which have been oppositely tickled. Certainly it must be allowed that Lablache's humour is more refined, and frequently becomes elevated to histrionic wit ; but there is a breadth and freedom in the drollery of Bedford which lays hold of our risible faculties, frequently before the judgment is appealed to a kind of taking by storm your "hearts and good humour" that is irresistible. His singing, we regret to say, was not so good as his acting. Madame Eugenia Garcia is much improved, and sang excellently. Allen seemed to be a little out of order. Burroni was very admirable, and the quartett at last pleased the audience that they were obliged, at the termination of the piece, to appear before the curtain. "The Old Guard" followed, in which Prosper and Barnett were, if possible, more exquisite than ever.

STRAND THEATRE

This pleasant and comfortable little theatre opened last Monday with a company "plurima in uno," in the person of Mr. W. J. Hammond, the Entrepreneur, who, à la Matthews, contrived per se to entertain a numerous auditory for several hours by his humour and versatility.—The idea of personating Punch, the popular Punch, who is worshipped in all the Trivia of the metropolis,

"By old who smile and young who laugh outright, is in itself a capital one, and was carried out with great artistical skill by Mr. Hammond, who with genuine Æsopian humour "fabulated and sang" excellently well, as far as he was personally concerned ; but his text-book requires some emendation and more novelty ; the greater number of the witticisms in it being either common-place or worn thread-bare.

DREADFUL LOSS OF LIFE, AND COASTING VESSELS.

Of the Note, on Wednesday the 18th, just at daybreak, a vessel in full sail was seen to go down head foremost, by Captain Mann, of the Sovereign steamer, and every soul was drowned. The Sovereign steamer was about three miles distant at the time, and it was impossible for assistance to be rendered At Hartlepool, near Sunderland, several vessels were lost, and almost the crews were placed in a most critical situation they were happy all saved. From Padstow, on the coast of Cornwall, the accounts are truly distressing. At about midnight on Tuesday the revenue officers discovered a vessel in distress to the eastward of the harbour, and ere they had time to give the alarm the ship was thrown by the tremendous sea on to the rocks under the high cliffs at Pentire, where she was literally dashed to atoms All her crew, consisting of nine seamen with the master, perished Six bodies have since been washed on shore, and interred in the churchyard of St. Mawe. The vessel was the Hope, belonging to Flamborough Head. Not a vestige of her or the crew has been seen At Harrington, on the coast of Norfolk, the following private letter has been received :—"I regret to state that the Rouly, of, and from Cork, was totally lost on the sands of the Coast Guard station. Immediately on her striking, the crew and master took to the rigging, where they remained five hours, and part of them were at last rescued by the rescue officers in a boat, after a communication had been effected between the shore and the vessel by Bennett's rockets ; but the remainder, two in number, fell a sacrifice. Their names are J. Osborne and T. Jackson. The vessel and her cargo, which consisted of oats, are completely lost. At Rideford the storm raged with destructive fury, occasioning we regret to add, serious loss of life. The wind blew fearfully from W. to N.W., and all along the coast. While the storm was at its height on Wednesday, the brig Ganges, belonging to Sunderland, Capt. Owen, was driven out of the north part of the bar, and no doubt will shortly become a total wreck. The crew took to the rigging, when, on being perceived by the Coast Guard officers, the men were ordered to launch the boat, and attempts were made to reach the vessel ; but this, however, failed, and they were forced to return to the shore, it being impossible for any small boat to outlive the hurricane. The unfortunate creatures remained clinging to the rigging of the wreck the entire night amidst the storm. The sea having moderated during the night, the boats were again launched, and the crew, we are happy to say, were saved, though in a most distressing condition. About an hour before this occurrence, a schooner went down about a mile from the shore, and it is supposed the crew, not having been heard of, were all drowned. Another shocking shipwreck happened soon after near the same spot. A brig, supposed to be the Hatcher, of Gloucester, went down in the harbour, all hands perishing with her. The other vessels reported to be lost are the following :—The Eliza, laden with coals, from Wales to Cork, wrecked in Royal Bay, near the above-named vessel, and, unless rescued, is to be a total wreck, with bulwarks gone. Another lay in the Swin, on the Essex coast, crew drowned ; at the mouth of the Humber a fishing boat was run down by a collier—six lives lost ; another collision happened near the spot in the succeeding gale, which was attended with the total loss of the Adonis. The Barbara, Captain Roberts, of Newcastle, was near Orient—crew saved ; Captain Roberts, saved ; the Betsey, Charles Bayne, master, from Stockholm, was wrecked near the coast of Schouwen ; crew saved ; the brig Symmetry, Captain Palmer, was run down in the Humber—crew saved themselves by the boats ; a schooner, about 90 or 100 tons burden, went down on Weisdog in Forlock Bay, about two miles from the shore—all hands were lost. A vessel laden with coals, struck on the Goodwin Sands, and during the following night separated beneath the sands, at Whitby, in Yorkshire, the Success, of Ipswich, foundered off the harbour—part of the crew were lost in the vessel, and the remainder saved themselves in the boat

Fourteen other wrecks are known to have occurred, but the names of them were not ascertained.

A very fine specimen of Indian cattle of the breed brought over by Viscount Combermere on his return from the East Indies, has been presented by his lordship to the Queen. Preparations are made at Combermere Abbey for their transit to Windsor, where they will form a very acceptable addition to Prince Albert's stock in the royal farm at Frogmore.

By an ukase, issued at Warsaw on the 11th inst., the Emperor of Russia declares that, from the 1st of January next, all the Jews of Poland, between the ages of 20 and 25, are to be liable to serve in the army. Hitherto the Jews have paid an annual sum for exemption from military service.

M. Maurice de Balmyer, who, on leaving prison, went to France, returned to Carlsruhe a few days ago, with two Frenchmen, to resume with M. de Sacharaza, the second of the unfortunate Gozlar, this deplorable affair, which has made so much noise. M. de Sacharaza, who behaved with perfect honour in the affair, has formally and very properly refused to fight The police have compelled the two Frenchmen who came with M. de Haber to repass the frontier.

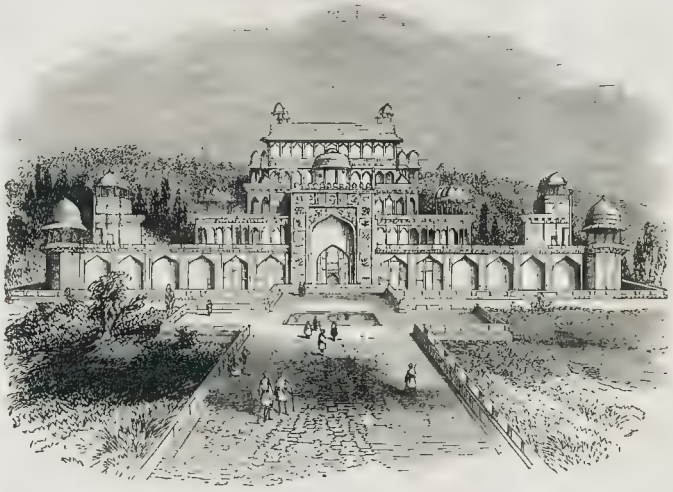
The town of Leon, which has recently revolted against the Provisional Government of Spain, is situated between Valladolid and Oviedo. It is a place of some importance, and contains 12,000 inhabitants. It was formerly fortified, but is now an open town ; its walls, which were chiefly of marble, having fallen to ruins

A meeting of the Anti-Corn-law League was held at Manchester on Monday last, for the purpose of adopting an address to the city of London electors, on the return of Mr Pattison.

The Journal des Débats states that the Belgian Government has received, from its Chargé d'Affaires at New York, official information of the decision of a treaty of commerce between the German Customs Union, and the United States of America.

We regret to notice the death, after a short illness, on the 30th ult., at Patras, of Henry Robinson, Esq., her Majesty's Vice Consul at that place, as also manager of the Patras branch of the Anglo-Greek Commercial Bank, and resident partner in the highly respectable firm of Bariff, Hancock, and Co. Mr. Robinson has left a widow and two young children, who are now on their voyage from England to Patras, and will thus only arrive to find their home desolate.

SALE OF THE MOGOL SULTAN AKBER'S PALACE AT THE EAST INDIA DOCKS.



TOMB OF AKBER.

There is no reflection more mortifying to human pride than that which occurs to the moralist when he witnesses the degradation, ruin, and dispersion of the mighty edifices of ancient days—edifices which were destined by their founders to carry down to the latest generations the memory of the monarch or potentate at whose expence they were constructed

A striking example of the futility of this species of architectural and regal ambition has been afforded during the course of the week that has just elapsed. Our readers are probably for the most part cognizant of the name of Akber, the third of that powerful line of princes who, under the name of Mogols, ruled in such extraordinary pomp and with so unprecedented a magnificence for more than two centuries and a half over the enormous triangular breadth of country comprised between the westernmost boundaries of Lahore, the rivers Indus and Burrampooter, and the seas that wash the line of coast extending from Aracan to the Gulf of Scinde We are not going to enter upon a biographical account of the Sultan Akber, although there are circumstances to be found in the Persian records of his life, entitled "Akbernameh," which are unknown to all save the sedulous, though unrewarded, Oriental student, and which well merit the attention of the historian and the philosopher. We shall content ourselves with merely stating the fact that he succeeded his father Humayoon (whose possession of the throne of Delhi had been very insecure) in the year 1556, being then thirteen solar years and four months old.

The exposed situation of the city of Delhi, the general open position of the country around it, and the enormous accumulation of ruins in the immediate vicinity of his capital, arising from the repeated attacks to which its former possessors, the Patan rulers, had been subjected by his own immediate ancestors, Baber, Sharock, and, greater than all, Tamerlane—all these circumstances induced Akber, some years after his accession to the throne, to remove the seat of government to a spot less open to inroad, and offering stronger natural defences than Delhi possessed; and accordingly, in the tenth or twelfth year of his reign, the emperor selected the then small and insignificant village of Agra as his future residence, the site being considerably elevated above the banks of the Jumna, and offering a position for the erection of a fort which would command not only the land but also the river access to his new capital.

The principal structure raised on the spot, chosen by the Emperor, or his architect, occupied upwards of 50 acres of ground. Within these limits was erected a palace consisting of three distinct courts, each surrounded by buildings; the first or outermost being occupied by the imperial troops and household servants, who, under the titles of Bundookcheecan (riflemen), Durbanan (gate-keepers), and Khidmutteeah (footmen, some armed, others not), guarded the approaches to the second court, wherein were lodged the Omrahs, or great officers of the household; the Manasubdars in command of the Imperial Guard; the Ahdean (or body guard, a corps similar to that of the old French Guard, known by the name of the Garde du Corps); and other confidential and superior officers; the third, or inmost court, contained the residence of Akber himself; one side of the quadrangle forming the Great Hall of Audience, wherein the Padishah, seated on a throne placed on a single block of black marble, received twice in every twenty-four hours the salutations of his people. On the other side of the quadrangle, containing the throne and its marble base (which overlooked the river and the surrounding country for many miles), was situated the Zenana, or women's department of the royal abode; and it may be observed that both the public and the private portions of this palace were constructed in so exquisitely beautiful and grandiose a style of architecture as to justify the assertion that Akber built like a giant, and finished his work like a jeweller.

The whole of these buildings, as well as the courts which they enclosed, were protected and partly concealed from view by the high embrasured walls of the Fort of Akber-Abad (or the City of Akber), as the Emperor caused his new capital to be styled; and the approaches were further guarded by a deep ditch, 40 feet wide, the entrance being formed by a magnificent portal closed by highly-sculptured gates, and rendered inaccessible at will by a drawbridge and portcullis.

It is now nearly twenty years since we visited the palace and fort, of the extent and position of which we have endeavoured to give a particular, though necessarily a succinct account. The fort itself was in tolerable condition, though the ditch was dry, the walls degraded, and the aspect in general that of a vast edifice falling rapidly into decay and ruin, from an unwise, though pertinacious neglect on the part of the actual rulers of India to bestow a trifling annual sum towards keeping it in repair.

The parts which most deserved, as they most attracted attention, were however in a much worse state than the outer buildings, as far as actual integrity was concerned. They were the Hall of Audience and the Zenana. The former was a quadrangular chamber, entirely lined with white marble, which was richly embossed, or rather adorned with elaborate and intricate arabesques, inlaid in the marble itself, and presenting an uniformly smooth surface, covered over from the floor to the ceiling with beautiful designs, formed of the different kinds of coloured stones of the secondary class, namely, agates, sardonyxs, jaspers, jades, bloodstones, lapis lazulis, cornelians of all hues, sparrs, amethystine and ruby-coloured gems, and indeed every variety of shade that was requisite to represent either the flowers, fruits, leaves, or other objects which the whole device was intended to represent.

The Zenana was adorned in a similar, though scarcely so rich a manner, the devices or patterns let into the wall being chiefly confined to the borders of the marble pannels, the jambs of the doors, and the sills of the strictly-closed windows, or rather breathing apertures. Nevertheless, the variety of patterns and the elegance of their design, as well as the neatness and fidelity with which the different flowers and other inanimate objects were imitated in these hard and durable materials, gave an air of extreme elegance and beauty to the apartments formerly occupied by the lovely denizens of Akber's seraglio, and as we stood and gazed on this charming abode, the reflection that the infant hands of the Sultan Selim (afterwards Jehan Guir, whose private history offers a curious and impressive parallel to that of David, King of Israel) had probably set the first example of picking out the precious stones that adorned the walls, passed through our mind, and caused a feeling of regret that the probable amusement of the child should have found so many imitators in after days,—for in many places the gems were entirely abstracted, and the walls in a lamentable state of dilapidation.

A few years after this visit, Lord W. Bentinck caused the most ruinous part of the Dewan Khaneh Aum to be removed, the materials being sold by public auction, and shortly after this, it being found impossible, we suppose, to restore the Zenana, or to preserve it from further and very rapid decay, this elegant ruin was likewise removed, the materials of which it was composed being sold in a similar manner to those of the Audience Hall of the Palace, we believe.

However that may be, the ornamental parts which we have described above, fell into the possession of a servant of the Bengal Government, of high rank in the civil department of the district. By this gentleman they were packed up in cases and at a vast expense transmitted down to the Jumna and Ganges rivers, to Calcutta, and thence to England, where they arrived about four years ago.

Some days since our attention was attracted by an advertisement in the newspapers announcing for public sale at the East India Export Dock, the remains of the Palace of the Sultan Akber; and on enquiry we were obligingly informed by some gentleman, connected, we believe, with the department where they were lodged, that the cases in question contained the fragments of the Palace of Akber Khan, which was destroyed by the soldiery after the murder of our Envoy at Caubul. Highly edified as well as amused by this lucid and authentic statement, we hastened to the docks to inspect the marbles themselves, when we at once discovered that they must have come from some of the Mogol Emperor's ruined palaces instead of having traversed the mountains of Affghanistan; and a few further enquiries in the proper quarter gave a right clue to our researches and enabled us to furnish the preceding account of the origin of these remarkable productions of ornamental art.

The sale took place on the 10th inst., and was chiefly attended by those indefatigable and enthusiastic lovers of the fine arts who dwell in the neighbourhood of Wardour-street. The prices obtained for the various cases of inlaid marbles ranged from £5 and £6 to £12 and £14. The windows (which were of red terra cotta, and others of red stone from the quarries of Futtehpoor), beautifully moulded and carved in an infinity of patterns, sold from 12s. to 35s. and 40s. a case, each containing one large, or two small windows. In more than one of the cases, as we narrowly inspected their contents, we observed a large and elderly-looking spider, when the beautiful line of the poet Sadi—immediately occurred to memory, with this reflection, that even the Sooft poet, brilliant as was his imagination, and bold as were his conceptions, could never have dreamed of the possibility of the palace of the most eminent of the Mogol Cæsars being packed up in cases and sold piecemeal in a warehouse many thousand miles distant from its original site.

THE ROYAL VISIT.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO THE EARL OF HARDWICKE.—WIMPOLE, Friday Evening, 27th October.—Her Majesty arrived here last evening, about half-past five o'clock, escorted by the yeomanry of the county, and was received by the noble Lord-Lieutenant, at the entrance of a private road which leads to Wimpole, about two miles distant. At seven o'clock the royal party sat down to dinner. Covers were laid for twenty-four. Her Majesty retired to rest at an early hour, and was up betimes in the morning. Her Majesty, accompanied by his Royal Highness, the noble host and hostess, and the royal suite, walked about the beautiful grounds; and at eleven his Royal Highness went out on a shooting excursion, attended by the Earl of Hardwicke and Mr. Anson. Her Majesty takes her departure in the morning. Her Majesty's route is from hence to Royston, and back to London, as she came.

The author of "Valentine Vox," on the 1st of November next sends forth to the world his new humorous work, "Silvester Sound," with steel illustrations. It is to be issued in the popular form of monthly parts, at 1s each.

THE LATE SIR CHARLES BELL.—The following letter from the Prime Minister to the widow of the late Sir Charles Bell, announcing that a pension has been conferred upon her, ought, we think, to be made known. Such a compliment to her husband's memory must have been far more gratifying than the small pension which it announced.—"Madam,—I have had great pleasure in recommending to her Majesty that, in consideration of the high attainments of your lamented husband, and the services rendered by him to the cause of science, a pension of £200 per annum for your life shall be granted to you, from that very limited fund which Parliament has placed at the disposal of the Crown for the reward and encouragement of scientific labours. This pension, small in amount as it necessarily is, will, perhaps, be acceptable to you as a public acknowledgment on the part of the Crown, of the distinguished merit of Sir Charles Bell.—I have the honour to be, madam, your faithful and obedient servant,

THE NELSON STATUE.

There is a very general impression that we have not, as a nation made sufficient use of that principle, as an impulse to great exertions which in former times constituted the very spirit of chivalry, and which, at a more modern period, Burke called the "cheap defence of nations." We do not mean that we have no admiration of heroic deeds in war, or no estimation for greatness of other kinds; but we have not been sufficiently alive to the importance of proving that admiration and that esteem. The outward and visible marks of merit were, till recently, very sparingly bestowed even in the military and naval services, and then they were almost exclusively confined to the superior ranks. No other kind of merit whatever was acknowledged even to this extent. The death of the great in action, or the great in thought, scarcely altered their position among us. The greatest names our annals have had to boast, have frequently been long without a public memorial of their manes, or a public tribute to their worth. There has been a neglect and apathy on the subject not to be accounted for in a satisfactory manner. The indifference appears to have been the same, whether its object was the warrior or the sage. We have some hopes, however, that the reproach is one from which we shall gradually clear ourselves.

The statue of Nelson—the hero of Trafalgar—having been completed, has been for a short space made visible to the public from a nearer point of view than many of them are destined to have of it in future. It has been exhibited on the surface of terra firma, previous to its elevation to the summit of the column, henceforth Nelson's Column, in Trafalgar-square—a locality which, were it not for the common-place character of the front of the National Gallery, would become the finest open space in the metropolis. The exhibition of the statue is not only a well-advised concession to public curiosity, but an advantage to the artist—not in the pecuniary sense of the word, of course—being a means of making familiar to the people the talent of one of our best sculptors. Those who have seen his "Nelson"—colossal in size—the features true to nature—a portrait in stone, not an idealism of a hero—the costume, that of an English Admiral, "in his habit as he lived," and partaking of the every-day character, which is the great difficulty of all artists, when they have to deal with the costume of the nineteenth century in any shape—a costume which no skill can elevate to dignity, or transform to the graceful—will have received, probably, a mingled impression. Unless they remembered they were looking at an object intended to be seen only at a great elevation, they may have been surprised at a sort of coarseness in the workmanship. Yet it has all the finish that can be required, and it has the great merit of likeness and character—one perhaps inseparable from the other in the countenance of such a man as Nelson. It has the sharp, angular features, the expression of great activity of mind, but of little of mental grandeur; of quickness of perception and decision; and withal, that sad air, so perceptible in the best portraits of the warrior, of long-continued physical pain and suffering, the consequence of his many wounds, which accompanied him throughout his brightest triumphs, though it never abated his ardour or weakened his energies. The expression is a peculiar one; it is more afflicting to the eye than the expression of deep thought; and though as mournful, it is less abstracted than that of meditation. It is the burden of the crown, and the shadow of the laurel; heavy is the first, and dark is the second, to those who obtain them, except in a few favoured instances; one of these favoured few Nelson was not. If ever man earned his greatness, both by action and suffering, it was the hero of Trafalgar. While we feel a satisfaction that a public memorial to him is now completed, we cannot help regretting that more than thirty years should have elapsed before so obvious a duty to his renown—a part of our national history—was accomplished. His monument can hardly be considered as a national tribute to his fame; it is a funeral record, it is raised in a sacred spot, and is consecrated by religion; the interest it possesses is of a higher and more sacred kind. This statue is the public and secular memorial—the tribute of the citizen to the warrior—and till now, in the metropolis of the nation he fought and died for, that tribute had remained unpaid!

"How nations slowly wise, and meanly just,
To buried merit raise the tardy bust," seems likely to remain a reproach to us, unless the future is an improvement on the past. We are glad to see that there are some signs of an improvement. The last session of Parliament produced a vote of public monuments to Sir Sydney Smith and Admiral de Saumarez; these are names of high renown—yet they are, and will be in the page of history, second to that of Nelson. It is well to see their merits so much sooner acknowledged in this manner. The talents and the energy that form the greatness of a people, or help to preserve it, are worth encouraging, and this form of the tribute to departed greatness—that of the public memorial—appeals more directly to posterity, while (for we are a mercantile nation in all things), it burdens it less than any other. There is one other consideration connected with the subject. Is military or naval greatness the only kind of superiority we are thus to acknowledge? "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war." There are victories of science; there are conquests of mental enquiry; and those who achieve them add to the happiness of mankind, or accelerate the progress of society to a better state; with every admiration for what is defensible in "war and the great in war," we cannot but recollect that there is another side to the picture. If there is

"The morning-march that glitters in the sun," there is also

"The feast of Vultures when the day is done," and both should be borne in mind when drawing our estimate. On the other side there may be victories without a pang, and triumphs without a tear, and we hope the day is coming when their heroes will be equally commemorated with those of war. Emulation is equally felt by them, and fame is as strong a stimulus to the labourers in the fields of thought, as to those who sternly gather the bloody harvest of battle on shore or ocean. There is an awakening to some activity in the mind of the public on this subject, and in the hope that it may be well directed, we have thought a few remarks on it not out of place in chronicling the completion of the statue of Nelson.

EXHIBITION OF THE NELSON STATUE, AT CHARING CROSS.

This colossal statue is now completely finished. The figure of the great naval commander measures seventeen feet from the base or plinth on which it stands, to the top of the hat. The whole is cut out of stone brought from Scotland, from the Granton quarry of the Duke of Buccleuch. It weighs nearly eighteen tons, has been taken to pieces, and the raising was commenced on Friday morning, November 3, at four o'clock. The statue has been thrown open to the public, and visited by a hundred thousand persons, in two days.

PARIS, OCTOBER 31.

SPAIN

The important question of the majority of the Queen was presented to both Houses of Parliament on the 26th. The 27th the Senate and Congress appointed a Committee to examine and report. Here, then, the real struggle commences, and intrigues of all descriptions are afloat. In my opinion the majority or minority of the Queen is of little moment; the real question is—Are the different parties now striving for power prepared to obey the laws of the Cortes, in they what they may? Decidedly not. The majority of the Queen may be declared, the Central Junctists will consider the act as illegal, a portion of the nation not being represented in the Cortes: The Espartorists, the Francesco de Paulists, the Carlists, the Fuerists—all will proclaim the act illegal, and, as such, not obey it. To be not deceived, Spain is rotten at the core, and sooner or later must pass through the ordeal of a terrible convulsion. Can it for a moment be supposed that Narvaez and Lopez entertain the same political opinions?—the one an ultra-Moderate, the other a ci-devant ultra-Liberal, indeed, a demagogue! For a time they may act the hypocrite, they may lay aside their fangs—and believe me it is not far distant—when they will be at daggers drawn. Already have the Chambers rung and been degraded with the disputes of some of the most influential members; the Count de Las Navas, an inclined Liberal accused Narvaez with wishing to establish a military government. Narvaez rebuked—cards were exchanged, and Madrid was prepared for a duel; friends however, interfered, and the matter is settled in form but not in spirit, and Narvaez will find a formidable opponent in the Count. There will be little opposition to the nomination of a president, all parties being agreed to name M. Olozaga; it is also reported that a compromise has been effected as to the vice-president, and that two Moderates and two Liberals are to be named. Notwithstanding all the efforts of the government the insurgents still hold out in several parts of the kingdom; in Leon they gained a small advantage, and made some prisoners. General Sanosian, however, writes under date of the 23rd that he was in pursuit of them down to the surrender the next day. The insurgents of Saragossa, in order to gain time, agreed with General Concha on the 20th to suspend hostilities until the government should have replied to their manifesto, but on the 22nd, in Barcelona the insurgents seemed determined on taking the offensive; on the 24th, three batteries attacked Gracia, Sanz, Clot, and Barcelonnetta, but they were soon silenced by Fort Bonjouch and the Citadel. The 25th ult. there was a heavy firing of musketry. General Sanz is not so sanguine as he was some few days since; he has received strong reinforcements, but not finding his means sufficient he has sent two columns to Saragossa for more troops. Prim is firing away in Girona; the Tower of Saint Jean has been destroyed. Colonel Martell, the same officer whom the telegraph described as having fallen into the hands of the Queenites, is raising recruits in the Languedoc, and has his head quarters at Figueras. A letter from Carthagena of the 21st ult., gives a description of a most dreadful hurricane on the coast; several vessels were lost and the crews perished; many vessels were upset. The Countess of Toreno was daily expected in Madrid

PORTUGAL.

INSURRECTIONARY MOVEMENT AT VIGO.—By the Pasha steam vessel of the Peninsular line of packets, Captain Wilson commander, arrived on Monday at Southampton in four days from Vigo, intelligence has been received of an insurrectionary movement in that town, which, though few particulars of it have been obtained, seems to have assumed an important character. Captain Wilson states that he brought with him as passenger from Lisbon to Vigo General Iriarte, one of Espartero's officers, and that he came to Vigo on the invitation of the party which began the movement. Fighting had commenced on the 24th inst., and from that time to the arrival of the Pasha the city was in the possession of the National Guard, who had organized the revolt. As soon as General Iriarte landed he placed himself at their head. Such was the state of confusion in the place, that Captain Wilson did not think it prudent to land. The vessel, which towed on the 24th, sent a boat on shore with the mails, but came back, on account of the conflict in the town, and the bag was sent for by the authorities of the place. In the bag which concurred between the National Guard and the government regular troops the latter were worsted, but few was lost, and Don Antonio Seoane commanding the government troops was wounded in the thigh On the landing of General Iriarte great enthusiasm was displayed, and a firing of rockets took place.

From the hasty manner in which Captain Wilson left, this is all the information that can be collected.

ITALY.

The latest accounts from Bologna, dated the 21st, describe the whole of the Papal dominions to be in a state of great agitation. The insurrection may be considered at an end, but the insurgents still hold out, and cause great uneasiness to the Pope. Cardinal Amat has sent the Count Spinola as Governor of Bologna, but the Pope, although he has consented to grant him leave of absence, has refused to sanction his retirement. A letter from Pisa says that the Duke d'Aumale intended visiting Rome in that town on his way, but a private message from his royal father to the Pope. "This much is certain,' says the same letter, "only a few days since the French ambassador offered his holiness an armed intervention, and that at the expense of France." The Papal brig, the Leopard, had left Civita-Vecchia for Leghorn, to bring away a number of state prisoners. A French three-decker was at anchor in the port of Civita Vecchia.

The Duke d'Aumale reached Turin on the 19th, and was met by his abode at the Palace Carignan, prepared for him by order of his Majesty. On the 20th, the Duke accompanied his Majesty at a grand review; there were also present the Hereditary Prince of Lucques, the Duke de Genevois, and the Duke of Savoye-Carignan; the Duke of Savoye commanded a brigade. The Marquis de Boyl de Putnyfigan has been ordered by the King to attend on the Duke.

A private letter from Lucques, of the 20th inst., says that an amateur theatrical society had been formed, composed of all the first families, having at its head the Duke de Dens. Already three French pieces had been performed at the Grand Theatre for the benefit of the poor. The houses were crowded, and the receipts exceeded £700.

FRANCE.

We have little or nothing starring in the political world; the affairs of Greece seem to occupy greatly the attention of the ministers, who, I am informed, highly approve the late revolution. The Chinese expedition, with M. Lagrenée, leave on the 4th of November, but the letters and other communications which will not sail until the month of January next year; they are to be accompanied by the Duke d'Harcourt, secretary to the embassy.

The royal family continued at St. Cloud, making frequent excursions to Versailles, where, occasionally, operas are represented. The last performance was "The Deserter

The following is an extract from an official document; it will be found interesting "The high clergy of France is composed of 15 archbishops and 65 bishops. Of the archbishops, three only were named during the Restoration; the remainder since the late Revolution. Of the 80 bishops, one was appointed during the Consulate of Napoleon (Cardinal de Latour d'Auvergne); 17 were named during the Restoration; and 57 by the present Government." M. de Cornac, Archbishop of Sens, died on the 20th inst., aged 79 years

A letter from Montpellier announces the death of Baron Capelle, well known to most of the English nobility. The Baron was Minister of Commerce to Charles X., and remained as such for many years after the fall, on the 30th ult., greatly regretted.

I am credibly informed that a scientific congress is likely soon to be held, either at Rouen or Havre, to examine several newly invented locomotives. The meeting, it is reported, will not separate without agreeing to a petition to the Chambers, demanding the prohibition of English machinery.

It was stated yesterday, in the salons of the Austrian Ambassador, that Prince Metternich had decided on sending to China not only a diplomatic agent, but a naval officer, to protest such Austrian subjects as might trade with the Celestial Empire.

The Duke de Montpensier returned to Paris on the 27th. The Duke d'Aumale, after paying a visit to the King and Queen, left for Compiègne, to which the chateau of Gouvoria on the 22nd, for Genoa, where the frigate Asmodée is waiting for him.

On Sunday evening last his Majesty received, in the public rooms of the Chateau St. Cloud, M. Lagrenée, the Chinese Ambassador, the secretary to the Embassy, and all the attachés. It is stated as certain, that immediately after the opening of the Chambers, the Minister will come forward to settle on the Princess Amours £40,000 a year. The Chamber of Deputies, a few sessions back, refused to sanction the same grant. The Ministers have now made it a Cabinet question.

A gentleman, who lately left the banks of the Seine, informs me that the Duke of Nassau, who frequently makes excursions from Biberich to Bengen, ran some danger of being upset, but was saved by a fisherman.

Mrs. Alfred Shaw was engaged at Trieste, in the autumn of 1841, in which season she appeared as Camilla, in Herold's "Zampa" and in Paolni's "Saffo;" in the latter she took the part of Clemene, Deranucort being Saffo, Bandiali, Alessandro, and Salvi, Rosse. Nothing can be finer than the part of Zampa sustained by Bandiali. In the spring of 1842, Mrs. Alfred Shaw was at the Teatro Reale at Turin, she sustained the part of Pierrotta in "Lindu di Chamouni," with Coleni as Antonio. She has had the honour to perform with the two finest Bassi Cantanti in the world, Cesare Bandiali, and Fileppo Colei

The debût of Fornasari at our Italian Opera was most satisfactory; he was received with continued rounds of applause. 'Maria de Rohan' will be brought out on the 10th of November, preceded by the "Pirate," in which will appear Mario and Persiani. It is said that M. Persiani has written an Opera Buffa.

"Don Sebastian" will definitively be brought out on the 15th November. The poet and the musician have united their efforts to make the fifth act the most interesting. In this act is a duo for Duprez and Madame Stoltz, a romance for Mdlle Stoltz, a trio for Duprez, Barrielhet, and Madame Stoltz, and a barcarole for Barrielhet. Berlioz intends giving a grand musical festival at the Grand Opera, on the 20th of Nov. Meyerbeer enjoys but indifferent health; the celebrated maestro, however, works hard at his "Crocciato"—his "Prophète" will not be produced this season. Rossini on quitting Paris, left a musical souvenir. M. Troupena will soon publish some religious pieces of the illustrious composer.

Calitachs and his family reached Naples on the 19th, by the Maria Antonietta. Thalberg, who had been staying at the baths of Ischia, arrived the same day. Lablache is staying at his delicious villa, Pausilippe. It is expected he will perform in "Don Pasquale," at the theatre San Carlo. Thalberg intends remaining several concerts. Mademoiselle Sarah Felix, sister to Mademoiselle Rachel, has arrived at Florence, and pleased herself under the direction of Maestro Romani. The musical works lately published at Naples are by Roberto Devereux." La Beatrice Pancani. and Torre, were greatly applauded in Elizabeth, Robert, and Nothing lasts. Report speaks in the most flattering terms in Vienna of a new opera by Nicolai (the author of "Templario," called "Hermann." It is said that Liszt is seriously occupied in writing an opera in five acts, the libretto by George Sand. Auber's "La Port de Diable" has been greatly applauded at Leipsic and Frank fort. Mademoiselle Pauline Viardot has left for the Italian Opera of Saint Petersburgh.

The congress of German philosophers, now sitting at Munich, presided by M. Thiersch, has voted a golden medal shall be struck in honour of M. Felix Mendelsohn Bartholdy.

Pacini has just finished an opera called "Lucietta," to be brought out during the next Carnival at Naples.

Four O'Clock

I have just received a letter from Bordeaux containing the following information; part of this news appeared this morning in the Courrier Français, I cannot vouch for its accuracy; indeed, I much doubt it; but as it is likely to be much discussed in our papers, I have thought proper to send it you:—

"The famous Carlist agent, Negrete, is now in Bordeaux." He is in daily conference with the chiefs of the Carlist and Espartorist parties; he desires to form an union between them, and so open the campaign in the Basque provinces As yet, Negrete has met with little success; even General Villareal has refused according to his plan. Negrete has many friends in England, particularly amongst the Tories. He is brother to the famous Father Negrete, who first raised the Carlist standard in Biscay. The Basque provinces are ripe for action, but I feel persuaded they will not take up arms either for Don Carlos or Espartero, but for their privileges. A M. Ferris is, at the present moment, very busy on the other side of the Bidassoa."

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

We have received accounts from the Cape of Good Hope to the 25th August, and we are pleased to find them of a very pacific and highly favourable tendency as regards Natal, whence our advices state that, on the 7th August, the emigrant farmers held their grand meeting at Pietermaritzburg, and agreed to accept the terms of his Excellency's proclamation for the settlement of the Natal affairs. They acknowledged the supremacy and authority of her Majesty, and the great work of pacification was thus considered as concluded. The highest degree of satisfaction had been expressed by all the authorities at this auspicious result.

We are sorry we cannot yet report favourably of the Kafir frontier, another barbarous murder having been committed. In the north-eastern district the Rev. Wm. Glen, a discharged corporal of the 75th Regiment. His body was terribly mangled by the savages. The border farmers were in a state of the greatest excitement, and were all in dread of their lives when leaving their homes, as a Pedlar had also a very narrow escape, being pursued a distance of two miles by four Kafirs. The father of this gentleman had lost 28 oxen and 2 riding horses within two months. An affray had also taken place between a party of the military, under Lieut. Bisset, and some of Tola's Kafirs, across the border, about 100 head of cattle being recaptured by our forces.

AMERICA.

The royal mail steam-ship Acadia, Captain Ryrie, arrived at Liverpool on Sunday morning, at a very early hour, bringing twenty six passengers. By her we have advices from America to the date of the 16th ult. from New York, and 16th from Boston. The Caledonia had arrived out at Halifax, and was met by the Acadia on the way to Boston. The doctrine of repudiation has now become obsolete in the non paying states. Nothing of importance has as yet transpired in the Canadian Parliament, the opening of which, by Sir Charles Metcalfe in person, we mentioned in our last. The answer to Sir Charles Metcalfe's address expresses the gratification of the house at the birth of a Royal Princess—its regret at the death of the late governess, and its desire for the facilities afforded by the introduction of Canadian wheat and flour—and a determination to promote improvements in the laws, institutions, and public works of the colony The address also expresses regret at the want of adequate government funds to construct roads, but trusts to the energy of the people to obviate temporary inconvenience, and the concern of the house at the considerable decrease in the revenue, which, it is hoped, will only be temporary, and that the house will give its best attention to the framing of a new tariff. It is understood—and, from its more central position, the choice seems judicious—that Kingston is to be the future seat of government. £90,000 is said to be the deficiency in the revenue, and a tax on American agricultural produce was expected as one measure of improvement. The number of emigrants who left Quebec this season, to October 1, was 20,333, and last year, to the same date, 43,007.

From New Brunswick we hear reports of a serious collision at Prince Edward's Island, between a party headed by Captain Crump and George Sherond, which ended fatally to the latter. The survivor has been committed to take his trial for manslaughter.

NORWICH.—On Sunday morning two barley stacks, standing close to each other, in the farm of Cosey Park, were discovered on fire, and by six o'clock were in a blaze, which the inhabitants, who promptly assembled, found it impossible to quench. There can be little doubt that this is the work of some diabolical incendiary.

NOTTINGHAM MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.—The municipal elections took place on Wednesday. Fourteen went out, seven of each party. The result was that 10 Tories and 4 Liberals were returned.

WINDSOR.—On Wednesday last the election of town-councillors, to fill up the vacancies of those who go out by rotation, took place at the Town-hall, Windsor, when five Conservatives and two Liberals were returned, viz., Messrs Hanson, Jennings, Tebbott, Caley, and Burridge, jun., Conservatives; and Mr Ingalton, the solitary Whig

SOUTH WALES.—A public meeting was held on Monday last, on the Penllwyn Robert estate, near Swansea, to take into consideration the distress of the country, in connexion with the Corn Laws, and to petition the Queen to dismiss her present Parliament at once. At two o'clock the meeting assembled, although the rain had been pouring in torrents, and continued to do so during the entire day, there were upwards of 900 persons present. In consequence of the rain the meeting was adjourned from the open air to a barn on the premises of the estate, which was roofed in.—Mr. Gibbs having been called to the chair, addressed them briefly in Welch, and, having read the advertisement calling the meeting, the Rev. Mr. Davis explained the object of the meeting, which was to have the present Parliament to be changed, because it did not meet the wishes of the country. They had nothing to say against Sir Robert Peel, but the country was in that sad state, that unless something was speedily done to relieve them they should all be ruined. The Rev. Mr. Davis, Mr. Jenkins, M.A., and several other gentlemen having addressed the meeting, the following petition to her Majesty was read and adopted :—

"TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

"The Petition of the undersigned Farmers, Workmen, and other inhabitants of the Parishes of Langafelach, Llangyfelach, and St. John, in the County of Glamorgan,

"Most humbly sheweth.—That your Majesty's petitioners are suffering from the depressed state of trade, which, as your Majesty's petitioners believe, has in a great measure been caused by the restrictive commercial policy pursued for a series of years by this country. That your Majesty's petitioners believing that similar conditions to that the impolicy of a retaliatory commercial intercourse have been by the recent commercial and agricultural depression brought home to the minds of a great portion of your Majesty's subjects,—pray your Majesty to dissolve the present Parliament, and to enable your Majesty to cause your Majesty's subjects to be informed in which the experience of the last three years has afforded to your Majesty's subjects. And your Majesty's petitioners, as in duty bound, &c.

CARDIFF SPECIAL COMMISSION.—CARDIFF.—At four o'clock on Saturday evening the jury returned a verdict of guilty against the prisoner Hughes, with a recommendation to mercy, on account of his previous good character. The court then adjourned.

On Monday morning the court was opened at nine o'clock, and immediately after Mr. Justice Coltman took his seat on the bench in the dock. An indictment was then read, charging them with having unlawfully, riotously, and tumultuously assembled, with divers others, to the number of fifty, and feloniously broke into a certain house in the parish of Llandeilo-Tal-y-bont, the property of William Lewis and others. The prisoners first pleaded not guilty, but after a short conversation between their counsel and Mr. H. Williams, their attorney, withdrew their pleas, and pleaded guilty. The Attorney-General then said, the prisoners having pleaded guilty, he did not mean to press in aggravation of punishment. Mr. Hill addressed the court in mitigation.

Thomas Hughes, who was convicted on Saturday, having been placed with the other prisoners at the bar, Mr. Baron Gurney addressed the prisoners at considerable length, dwelling with peculiar force on the heinousness of Hughes's offence, and concluded by sentencing him to seven years transportation. The other two were sentenced to seven years' transportation

In several other cases the parties pleaded guilty, and were liberated on bail and in some the Attorney General entered a nolle prosequi. The juries then retired, and the business of the commission terminated

CARMARTHEN, OCT. 29.—Yesterday John Jones, who is at present confined in the county gaol under several different charge, turned Queen's evidence, implicating several respectable persons (whose names are at present, and very properly, kept a secret) in the outrages which have lately taken place. Last night the county gaol was broken open, and the prisoner, was freed at, fortunately without effect; and the house of Mr. Will, superintendent of rural police, was attacked, and notice given him to quit the country within a fortnight.

IRELAND.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The usual weekly meeting of this association was held on Monday in the Conciliation-hall, which was tolerably well filled in all parts. It was very confidently stated on Saturday, and very generally believed, that Mr. Shell, Mr. Wyse, and other leading members of the Irish Whig Radical party, would send in their adhesion as "Federalists" to the association, but the report proved to be unfounded. Mr. O'Connell announced the repeal rent to be £1 167 1s (Loud cheers.) This made upwards of £3,000 received from Saturday to Saturday. The meeting adjourned until Monday next.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BRIGHTON.—THE LATE SALES.—The General Steam Navigation Company's packet, the Menai, Captain Goodburn, for whose safety considerable fears were entertained, arrived safely in Shoreham Harbour on Monday afternoon. On her return, she put into the Sheppards-gate, from Singapore, the captain of which vessel desired Captain Goodburn to report "All well." The Menai had a most terrific passage to Havre, on Friday night, and was twenty hours making the voyage. Captain Goodburn reports that a Dunkirk steamer foundered off Havre, on Saturday morning, and that all hands on board, he believes, perished.

THE HERRING FISHERY.—During the last week the fishery has gone on very prosperously. Upwards of 200 lasts, have been retailed in Brighton at twenty-four a shilling. A Brighton boat, the Robert William, Allen master, caught in one night, off the North Foreland, 70,000 herrings, which fetched £120.

BIRMINGHAM.—The municipal elections held to-day have terminated in the return of 8 or 10 councillors, of complete-suffrage principles, turning out as many Whigs and Radicals of doubtful character.

CAMBRIDGE.—MELANCHOLY SUICIDE.—On Tuesday night last a gentleman, named Challis, committed suicide at Cambridge in a most determined manner. The deceased was a drawing-master as well as a clerk to Messrs. Deighton, the Cambridge booksellers. It appeared that he committed the act between seven and eight o'clock at his own residence, in Trumpington-street. Information received by his family was a suspicion awakened by a strong smell of gunpowder. On entering the room in which the act was committed, he was found still alive, with a pistol in his hand, which had been loaded with ball, and the muzzle was placed towards the left side of his head, immediately behind the ear. The bullet had passed through his brain and fractured his skull on the opposite side. He lingered in great agony for about an hour, when insensibility succeeded, and he expired, leaving a wife and three children. Mr. Challis was the son of the butler of Pembroke College, who had held that situation many years, and was left a widower with two children, the eldest a son, now in his early age, was afflicted with a spinal disease, which finally brought her to the grave, though not until she had lived long enough to witness the committal of suicide by her father and uncle. The latter shot himself. The former, on being left a widower, married the cook of the College in which he was employed, a widow named Emerson. Some time afterwards he had a disagreement with the Fellows of the College in consequence of some trivial fault they found with him, and he forthwith drowned himself in the river Cam

DOVER.—In this borough the return of the municipal election gives 4 Liberals and two Conservatives

HASTINGS.—There were 3 Liberals and 1 Conservative elected for this borough.

HUNTINGDON.—On Saturday a serious fire broke out on Friday morning, the 20th ult., at Dowlis House, the residence of Sir John Guest, who, with his family, was fortunately absent at the time of the occurrence. Owing to the immediate steps given, and the wonderful exertions of fellow-citizens, who assembled in great number, the fire was confined to the new portion of the building, in which it broke out, and therefore the damage incurred is comparatively inconsiderable.

LEWES.—The return of councillors for this borough shows an equal balance, there being 5 Conservatives and 5 Liberals.

LEAMINGTON SPA.—The commencement of the regular hunting campaign with the present week, and the numerous packs possessed by the celebrated Warwickshire hounds, with regard to kennels, country, management, and all the usual accessories of a first-rate pack, have occasioned a more than wonted appearance of gaiety at this fashionable place. Never were the winter season promises to be one of great brilliancy. The town is rapidly filling with company, and among the latest arrivals are the Earl and Countess of Dunmore, Viscount and Viscountess Barrington, Lady Mary Hamilton, the Hon Miss Montagu, Sir James and Lady Carnegie and family, Sir John and Lady Burke, Lady and Miss Stanley, Hon. Colonel Chetham, Lady F. Ker, Count Chabot, Lieut.-General Fraser, Major H. A. O'Neill, Captain Ker, Mr. Williamson Barney LICHFIELD.—The Conservatives have had a triumph in the municipal election for this borough. Eight Conservatives and four Radicals were elected.

LIVERPOOL.—The municipal elections for this borough took place also on Wednesday and ended in the return of 12 Conservatives and 4 Libera s.

MACCLESFIELD. A pugilistic conflict took place near this town, between two men, named John Crump and George Sherond, which ended fatally to the latter. The survivor has been committed to take his trial for manslaughter.

SCOTLAND.

PAISLEY TRADE.—We regret to state that the winter trade, for which there was such extensive preparations, has been a complete failure, and both for the light muslins and other work, which is procured from Glasgow in abundance, upwards of 1000 weavers would be going idle. The failure in the Paisley trade is said to have been occasioned by a recent change in the London fashions, when silk was introduced woollen shawls (principally manufactured in Yorkshire) instead of the designs and fabrics produced by the Paisley manufacturers.

MURDER IN GREENOCK.—We are sorry to mention that a murder was committed in Greenock on Thursday last. Between two and three o'clock in the afternoon a report got abroad that Mrs. Wilson, wife of Thomas Wilson, spirit dealer, Springhill-street, had died very suddenly under circumstances that violence had been used. The report unhappily proved correct, as it was found that her throat presented marks of strangulation; and her husband, on whom suspicion rests, and who, we believe, made no attempt to escape, was immediately committed to prison. The unhappy woman was seen at the shop door a few minutes before she met her untimely fate. The event, as might be expected, has excited a great sensation in the neighborhood; and the parties who were looked upon as decent, respectable people, it is all the stronger. Wilson and his wife were in the prime of life.

A FATHER KILLED BY HIS SON.—In the beginning of last week an affray of a serious nature, and which has unfortunately been attended with fatal results, occurred in Kirkcunnie. At a place called Greenstyles there resides a family of the name of Reid, the male members of which, consisting of a father and two sons, are shoemakers. It appears that a quarrel had taken place amongst the parties, and a scuffle having ensued betwixt the father and son, the latter grasped hold of a shoemaker's "iron four," which had been lying within his reach, with which he struck the old man a blow on the head, which felled him to the ground. The poor man survived the assault three days, during which time he never spoke. The son has been taken into custody, and was lodged in gaol on Sunday last. The case will undergo strict investigation.

EDINBURGH.—THIRTY CHILDREN NEARLY POISONED.—On Monday, a number of children in the neighbourhood of Jamaica-street, Edinburgh, made a very juvenile luncheon. A shopkeeper had ordered a large quantity of a species of foreign nut (not unlike the gull-nut of the Scottish oak, which is used for making ink), to be turned out on the street, having no use for them. The nuts, unfortunately tempted the children playing about the street, and a general scramble took place for the poisonous substance. They had all partaken more or less of them; some of them, indeed, stating since that they had eaten as many as twenty. The injurious consequences were soon manifested, one child after another being seized with violent fits of vomiting and retching, palpitation at the heart, coldness at the extremities, and other symptoms of having swallowed poison. Luckily, medical assistance was speedily on the spot, else the consequences must have been frightful. In one building nine children were ill, and in some families two, and even three had to be attended to. It is understood that about thirty in all had partaken of the nuts; but it is gratifying to state, that however violent the symptoms were at an early period of the day, they were all in the evening (Monday) on the way of recovery. The nut is described as a native of a very hot climate, intim

THE CONCILIAITON HALL, DUBLIN.

THE CONCILIATION-HALL, DUBLIN.

This extensive edifice has nearly been completed in Dublin, or holding the meetings of the Repeal Association. It abuts upon the Corn Exchange, with the architecture of which its front assimilates.

The Conciliation-hall occupies a considerable extent of ground, being 60 feet in front along the quay, by 100 feet in depth. The first story of the front is composed of six plain pilasters, surmounted by a belting-course, and contains three entrances. Over the centre or larger gateway, is a representation of the ancient Irish crown and harp; and over the two side doors are Irish wolf-dogs, in stone. The upper story consists also of six pilasters, with ornamented capitals, and having fac similes of Brian Boroimhe's harp and crown in the centre of the foliage. The spaces between the pilasters are pierced for windows, having alternately raking and circular pediments, supported by lesser pilasters, and enriched consoles. The pilasters of the second story support an entablature and cornice, with raking pediment, the delta being occupied by a wreath of shamrocks encircling the inscription "The Repeal Year, 1843." The whole is surmounted by balustrades, with two reverse consols and cornu copiæ hanging from the volute. A pedestal is placed on the apex of the pediment, having in front the crest of O'Connell, surrounded by a wreath of oak-leaves in relief.

The interior of the Hall is not yet completed. Its shape is a lengthened parallelogram, and at the height of 15 feet from the ground, a capacious gallery, supported on iron pillars, and running the whole circuit of the building in an elongated ellipse, is reserved for the ladies. Above this gallery is placed the full-length portrait of Mr. O'Connell, "with his martial cloak around him," very blue seas and green hills in the distance. Lofty windows serve to light and ventilate the room; whilst numerous tin chandeliers, suspended by brass chains from the gallery, though not very ornamental, are likely to become useful in the nocturnal debates.

The opening of this building was described in our paper of last week.

OPENING OF THE LAW COURTS, WESTMINSTER HALL.

FIRST DAY OF TERM.—OPENING OF THE LAW COURTS.

Thursday being the first day of Michaelmas law term, the Judges, after partaking of a déjeûner with the Lord Chancellor, proceeded in state to Westminster Hall, and there, with the usual formalities, opened the several Courts of Law and Equity. Our illustration shows the procession passing through the magnificent Hall: foremost, is the Bearer of the Great Seal, and next, the Maceberarer, preceding the Lord Chancellor, in his state robes, his lordship's train borne by a gentleman in court costume: next is the Lord Chief Justice Denman, followed by a gentleman-at-arms. Then follow the Master of the Rolls, Vice-Chancellor of England, Lord Chief Justice of Court of Common Pleas, Lord Chief Baron, Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, Vice-Chancellor Wigram, Mr. Baron Gurney, Baron Maule, Justice Coleridge, Justice Coltman, Mr. Baron Rolfe, the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General, a long line of distinguished members of the profession, &c. The ceremony was, altogether, one of impressive state, and was witnessed by a great crowd of spectators.

The costume and appointments of the procession are very attractive. Thus, we have the superb crimson and gold of the bag of the great seal; the rich gold mace, and the embroidery, scarlet and ermine, of the robes; and the splendour of the jewelled collars, &c.

The Lord Chancellor also received the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Court of Common Council, at his house in George-street, and signified her Majesty's approbation of the choice which the citizens of London had made in selecting Alderman Magnay to the Mayoralty for the ensuing year.

OLD MAIDS.—Much has been written and said of old maids. They have been spoken of in terms of the deepest contempt; painters have represented them with crabbed aspect, scraggy necks, yellow complexions, busts particularly long, and fingers long, fleshless, and cold; while writers have described them as being skinny, toothless, arrogant, malicious, and wretched; but if the libellous painters and writers in question mean to contend that these are the prevailing characteristics of old maids in the aggregate, it will be at once perfectly clear that they never have studied the real flesh and blood. Theirs are merely conventional old maids! Henceforth let these libellers paint from Nature! Let them do justice to those who compose that honourable—albeit, peculiar—species of humanity, who have studied the respective characters of their sisters too deeply to be ensnared—who have met with none but those whose views were selfish, and whose affections were impure—who have not allowed their judgment to be blinded by passion—who have imagined man's love to be ethereal but have not found it so—who have never had the wish to make, in a worldly sense, a good match, and who have sufficient sense to escape the miseries of a bad one! It is, of course, admitted that a few of these honourable old maids—for even their contemptuous sobriquet is associated with honour!—may be busy, and not very mild; but the idea of making unmixable skeletons of them all is monstrous!—sufficiently monstrous to inspire indignation. Aunt Eleanor was an old maid, and she was no skeleton; nor was she malicious, nor toothless, nor wretched. On the contrary, her figure approached en bon point, her teeth were white and sound, and her skin was soft and clear: she had, perhaps, a fancy—a more animated—bust than any other lady in the county!—she was, moreover, neat, benevolent, amiable, and pure, while her heart was full of tranquil joy, for she was in spirit wedded to her God. Nor was there in this lovely cottage of hers the slightest thing indicative of the residence of an old maid. Everything indeed was neat and elegant; everything was arranged with the most exquisite taste; but there was no mania pinnacea perceptible. Nor must it be imagined for a moment that if the whole of her highly-prized china and glass had been swept from the sideboard and broken to atoms, she would have shed a single tear. No; nothing but love and sympathy could wring a tear from her.—Spectator Second, the Somnambulist.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XLIV.

JAMES EMERSON TENNENT, ESQ., M.P.

A great improvement has been effected in the law regulating patents. It had long wanted regulation, for it was, like too many other laws, by repeated additions and modifications, become intricate and complex, and a fruitful source of expensive litigation. There is scarcely an invention of any value that has been able to force itself into use without passing through Chancery, or being brought before the courts of law in some shape or other. We would merely, by way of proof, ask the newspaper reading public to try and recollect the number of actions that have sprung from the comparatively recently introduced system of wood-paving. Yet even the most elaborate modifications of the system are comparatively rude and simple to the thousands of ingenious inventions in various branches of mechanism which the wants of society call daily into existence. Were a history of inventions and inventors to be written, it would be a sad record of long years of toil of hand and brain, bringing to him who persevered through them nothing but disappointment and loss—even absolute ruin when he seemed on the threshold of success, and when others, by seizing on the perfected invention, were acquiring fortunes. The great Watt was for a long period always involved in law-suits, and the lately published life of Dr. Cartwright, who invented the power-loom, represents him as being depressed in circumstances from the same cause; and, in fact, only saved from poverty, though the creator of millions of national wealth, by a parliamentary grant. If we turn to things less tangible than mechanism, the case has been still worse: there are many products of our manufactures for which the demand depends, not so much on their intrinsic worth, as on the extent to which they please that undefinable thing called taste.

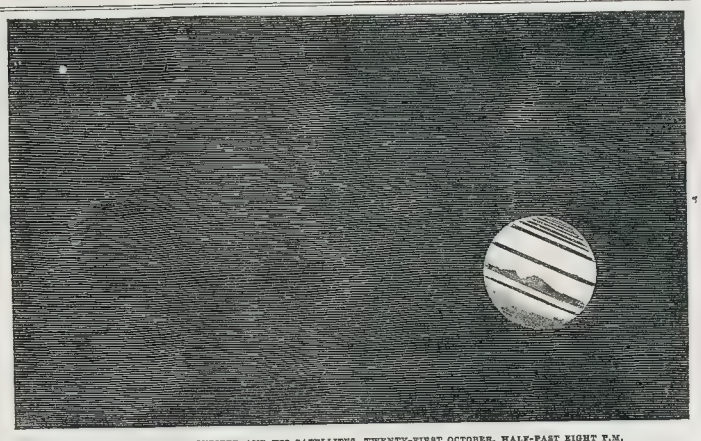
PORTRAIT OF EMERSON TENNENT, ESQ., M.P.

The subject of our sketch—Mr. J. Emerson Tennent—has effected a great amount of good to the manufacturers of this country by the zeal with which he has taken up the subject of the law of copyright, as applied to designs. The bill which, when it did pass, has proved so useful, was singularly unfortunate; it was postponed and deferred, and thrust aside by other business, time after time, experiencing all the delays to which bills not introduced as "Government measures" are almost invariably subjected. Two, if not three, sessions elapsed between the first introduction and final passing of the act; in the last session there was a still further extension of it, which was also very favourably received. Thus improvements win their way; obstructed and delayed, but seldom—if they contain a germ or principle of real benefit—altogether defeated. The worst effect of the want of security in the property of a design was, that it repressed and checked the exercise of invention. No man or body of men will expend time and labour in producing a thing that within a day or a week from its being completed, becomes an object of pillage to all and everybody in whom the love of gain is stronger than the principles of honesty.

Suppose, for instance, a gardener was to apply himself to producing the finest specimens of fruits and flowers, and as soon as he brought them to market, they might be seized and sold by any others who had the dishonesty to seize them, without the interference of the law to protect him from the robbery—would he subject himself a second time to the chance of injury? Certainly not; and therefore the law imprisons or transports the thief who "appropriates" a cabbage or a bunch of turnips with exceeding alacrity. By this protection to the producer, and the sense of security it creates, we have that result which any one may witness for himself by walking through Covent-garden market any day he chooses. But, unfortunately, the law has taken little note of matters not absolutely tangible to the senses; and one fruitful and exhaustless field—that of invention—has been left uncultivated by the arts that are necessary to make it bring forth its fruits, and the consequence is that in this department of manufactures we have hitherto been behind our neighbours, while we surpass them in all others. The lightness and beauty, the taste—to use a hackneyed but expressive word, for which we cannot find an exact substitute—of French fabrics, no one can dispute; they are superior to ours. But we must doubt if the superiority is to be attributed to any innate peculiarities or power of invention of the French producers. We can scarcely be accused of a want of invention—certainly not of a want of application. But the fact is, the talents of our neighbours have had encouragement and fair play, while ours have not; and we shall be disappointed if, under the new system, this difference continues long to be so marked as it is at present.

Mr. Tennent, who stands prominently forward in this respect, is one of the members for Belfast. He is the son of W. Emerson, Esq., a merchant of that city; the name of Tennent he gained by marrying the only daughter W. Tennent, Esq., an opulent banker.

With the name of the banker he also gained something more substantial than that "airy nothing," namely, certain estates in the counties of Antrim and Fermanagh. He studied the law, and was called to the bar from Lincoln's Inn. He has represented Belfast since 1832, but the possession of his seat has not been undisturbed. After the election of 1841, a petition was presented against his return, and he was unseated, but in the new election that ensued was again returned. The inquiry of the Belfast Committee was one of the numerous petitions on disputed returns that excited the attention and the wrath of Mr. Roebuck, though this particular one was not so marked as some others that could be mentioned. He was made one of the Secretaries of the Board of Controul in 1841; by his knowledge of matters connected with trade and manufactures he is well qualified for the situation, though in the House of Commons he is not a frequent speaker, nor anything like an eloquent one. He rarely interferes in the debates that are exclusively party ones, confining himself hitherto to the question he has taken up as his own—the law of copyright in designs. On this he is well informed, and on every occasion on which it was mooted brought to bear on it a well arranged mass of facts and information. He is tall in person, of a fair and florid complexion, and bordering on 40 years of age. He is, of course, a Conservative in his politics; but in the midst of his occupations as a law student, and an aspirant for senatorial honours, found time—it is always busy men who do find time—to devote himself to literature, giving to the world the results of his observations as a traveller in his "Travels in the Levant," a "History of Modern Greece," and a collection of "Letters from the Ægean," to which must be added his work on "Belgium," more recently published, and which is held to be a work both of merit as to composition and authority as to facts. He is a deputy-lieutenant for the counties of Sligo and Fermanagh, and an officer of the Antrim Militia.



TELESCOPIC VIEW OF JUPITER AND HIS SATELLITES, TWENTY-FIRST OCTOBER, HALF-PAST EIGHT P.M.

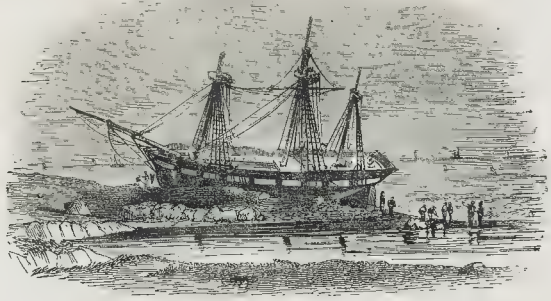
THE PLANET JUPITER.

The present nearness of the planet Jupiter to the orbit of the earth having made him both to ordinary and telescopic observers, a subject of much observation; and as the phenomena presented by his varying aspects are popularly considered to be the most beautiful of the "heavenly visions," we have, at the express wish of many of our subscribers, and assisted by the liberal aid of the Astronomer Royal, prepared an accurate engraving of his appearance on the evening of October 21st, when he was seen to great advantage. On that occasion the satellites visible were the 2nd 4th, and 3rd; the first satellite was eclipsed. In the out they are seen to the left of the planet.

The aspect of Jupiter was singularly beautiful. Near the bottom a dusky haze, clearly distinguishable in colour, and texture from the belts, gave sphericity to his figure and indicated the position of the sun. Above this was a narrow and tolerably uniform belt below the principal belt. The bottom of the principal belt was straight, but its upper edge had the appearance—"as it were"—of two mountains (the right hand one being the higher), with a depression between them sensibly lower than the level of other parts of the belt. Also, a little depression was observable to the left of the second mountain. The right hand mountain was apparently all that remained of the great spot, which, our readers will recollect has recently been a subject of much discussion; its form had totally changed, as at first it was a round spot, adhering to the top of the belt. Above this was a well defined narrow belt. Towards the right hand there was a small lump on it (scarcely enough to catch the eye). Above this came a single belt, with a bright space evident above it, and then the collection of belts at the top, quite different from the duskiness at the bottom. None of the belts were visible quite to the edge of the planet.



WRECK OF THE BARQUE "EMMA" ON THE NAYLAND ROCK, MARGATE.

WRECK OF THE BARQUE EMMA.

About the same time that the Burhampooter was wrecked, as we detailed last week, the barque Emma was driven on the Nayland Rock, near the entrance to Margate pier. The crew were saved; she was at anchor, and was driven from it by the severity of the gale. She was a fine barque, 311 tons burden; built at Whitby in the year 1829, and was the property of Messrs. Hacket and Co., of No. 137, Minories. She was laden with wood, and is partly insured.

The point at which the Emma has been wrecked is one of great danger, and has been the scene of many brave and humane rescues. In the Parliamentary inquiry for the enlargement of the pier at Margate, several years since, it was given in evidence that, within memory, nearly 500 merchant and other vessels had either been brought into the harbour, or received assistance from the Margate boats in tempestuous weather; that many of his Majesty's gun-brigs had been saved by such assistance, as well as the cargoes of several East and West Indiamen.

THE AGED PILGRIM'S ASYLUM, CAMBERWELL.

AGED PILGRIMS' ASYLUM, CAMBERWELL.

The annual meeting of this society was held on Thursday. Of the many valuable institutions with which London abounds, few deserve a higher place in the estimation of the philanthropist (yet few are less known) than the Aged Pilgrims' Friend Society, which was established in the year 1807, for the purpose of giving life-pensions of ten guineas and five guineas per annum, to poor, aged, and infirm Protestants, of both sexes, and of every denomination; and which has been the means of distributing in this manner, since its formation, the sum of £33,300. In its principles, it knows nothing of sect or party, either in the management of its funds, or the recipients of its bounty; and as it extends the right hand of Christian sympathy to all who give scriptural evidence that that they are of the household of faith, so it is indebted to many excellent clergymen of all denominations for the kind and judicious ministers of various denominations for advocating its cause; and it has at this present time 333 aged and infirm pensioners on its book. The committee of the society having for some years seen the practical good arising from their labours, were induced to endeavour to extend the benefits of the society beyond the granting of pensions: hence the origin of the noble almshouses which are the subject of our engraving. As soon as this determination was made known, William Peacock, Esq., of Grosvenor-place, Camberwell, generously presented the committee with a piece of freehold ground situated in Westmoreland-place, Camberwell, contiguous to the main road. This so encouraged the committee, that they used redoubled exertions to raise funds for erecting the requisite buildings, the liberality here equally supported by Christians of every denomination, more especially by the congregation of Grove Chapel, Camberwell, under the ministry of the Rev. J. Irons, who contributed upwards of £1000 towards the fund.

On Thursday, 16th of October, 1834, the first stone was laid by T. Challis, Esq., now one of the aldermen of the city of London, on which occasion the worthy alderman remarked, "that the interesting solemnity of celebrating the dedicating day of this Asylum was of a more religious nature than most acts of this description. The care of poor, aged, despised, and rejected disciples of Christ, was incumbent upon all his followers; and among the many splendid public buildings devoted to charity, how few were to be found for the exclusive reception of hungry, thirsty, naked, and, it is to be feared, houseless saints, unknown, but yet afflicted by the scorns and depressed by the frowns of the world. This Asylum was to relieve such characters, and to offer them a shelter in their declining days." The alderman then remarked, that "it was customary to deposit something of value in stones thus laid; coins of Emperors or Kings had been so appropriated; but now the word of God had been selected, which contained all his excellent and precious promises; and this blessed book being preserved in a glass case would last for ages." He then laid the bible in a beautiful, frosted glass box, in the centre of the stone (represented by our artist as seen through the gateway), and two of the piercing trowel 95, the other 88, placed their hands upon it while the Rev. James Bisset, the founder of the society, implored the Divine blessing on the building, its inmates, and the assembly.

The structure, of old English design, is by Mr. Abishon, and forms a quadrangle, affording accommodation for 42 inmates, each occupying a single room. Over the principal entrance is a small chapel for the use of the inmates; and the interior of the quadrangle is protected by sloping pent-houses, which afford to the inmates the opportunity of out-door exercise in wet weather.

We can assure our readers that they will be gratified by a visit to this excellent Institution, which is open for the inspection of visitors.

The ninth anniversary of the society was held on Thursday evening last, at the London Coffee-house, D. W. Wire, Esq., in the chair.

The meeting having been opened with prayer, the chairman, at great length and with his usual eloquence, explained the rise and progress of the society. The secretary then read the report, which was in substance to the effect that, in carrying out the Divine precepts of the founder of our holy faith, the committee have been able to erect an Asylum of late years for the reception of a part of the pensioners of the society. The Rev. W. Jay, in a most impressive manner, moved the first Resolution, that the Report should be adopted, which was seconded by the Rev. Dr. Bennet. A collection was then made. A vote of thanks was given to the chairman, who, in returning thanks said he could not let the meeting separate without calling the attention of all interested in this excellent charity to the fact that the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS had, in the most handsome manner, caused a beautiful drawing of the Asylum to be made by one of their eminent artists, which would appear in that excellent family newspaper on Saturday next; and he most earnestly recommended the friends of the society to possess themselves of such a beautiful memento of their benevolent exertions, and to have it framed and kept as an ornament.

The meeting was most respectably and numerously attended.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE CENSUS.—We have to thank numerous subscribers and correspondents for their favourable opinion of our Census Supplement, and, at the same time, to assure them that we shall spare no expense to bring forward, from time to time, such useful information as will gratify our readers, and insure the same favourable reception from the public. We shall continue to print new editions and copies may be ordered of all booksellers and newsvendors in the United Kingdom, or by orders direct to our publisher. Correspondents should bear in mind that being stamped as a supplement to our paper, it may be forwarded by post TO ALL PARTS OF THE WORLD FREE OF POSTAGE. We are confident that no work has ever been produced of such extent and labour at the price, and we are gratified to be able to state that the Government and public departments have expressed their favourable opinion of our arduous undertaking, and their astonishment that a Parliamentary document should exceed 60 pages, could have been compressed into the limits of sixteen, and in such a convenient form for reference.

" W." Edinburgh.—The population of the parish of Hinckley, in the county of Leicester, is given in our Census List; the population of the town of Hinckley is not stated in the Government return.

" W. H." Atherstone.—The township of Atherstone, in the parish of Manwerter, county of Warwick, contains 3,743 inhabitants; the population is included in our return for the parish of Mancetter.

CENSUS-TAKER.—Omitted in the proper place—Haddesdon Chapelry, Herts; pop 1743; Horton Kirby, parish, Kent, pop. 714; Kirkleaton, parish, Cumberland, pop. 1,903.

In reply to several correspondents we have to state that the returns of the population of the parishes in Scotland and Ireland are in preparation, and will be published as speedily as possible.

We are anxious to correct an error, in No. 77 of our journal, as to the comparative heights of the Napoleon and Nelson columns. It is there stated that the latter is 115 feet higher than the former, whereas the entire height of the Nelson column is 145 feet, and that of the Nelson column 173 feet, so that the excess of the latter is 28 feet.

" J. G. B. M."—Yes.

" G. J.," Deal.—The etiquette is for only servants of the Royal Family and of persons holding commissions under the Crown to wear the cockade.

" C. D." should have that article of our journal which he saw on Saturday night's post. The alteration may be made by our correspondent addressing a line to his newsman.

" A subscriber."—We have not room for the tariff suggested

" W. L. S.," Cape Town.—Thanks for his good wishes. We quote his amusing journal occasionally.

" X. Y. Z."—We have not seen the work.

" Peter," Pembroke.—Only a portion of the ransom-money has been paid.

" W. T., Hollowayrd.—It wilful neglect on the part of the railway servants can be proved, we think our subscriber may recover.

" W."—Most probably the S. A., when it appears, will be well advertised.

" J. F. P.," St. John's-square.—Under consideration.

" J. W.," Conduit-street.—The fault lies with the binder.

" T. N." should not complain of his inability to obtain a single copy; the better plan, to receive the paper regularly, is to subscribe for a quarter.

" W. D.," Landrake, Devonport.—All the numbers are reprinted, and may be had at the office, or through any news agent.

" A Loyal Subject."—We believe so.

" A. B. C."—We think the t correct

" W. H. P."—The acrostic has not reached us. The note has been forwarded to our chess correspondent.

" F."—The first railway established in this country, as a distinct undertaking, and intended for public use, was the Surrey iron railway; the company for which was formed in 1801.

" A. T."—We do not recommend it.

" M. P. S."—The distributor of stamps for the place in which our correspondent resides will grant a discount for expense for selling postage stamps

" J. B. B., Hull.—It will be useless for him to attempt to obtain a situation in the Customs: without great private interest. To obtain a situation in the Post-office is less difficult.

" W. M. A., Inverness.—Our Census supplement will go postage free.

" Melrose Abbey.—The portrait can only be obtained in our journal.

" A subscriber," Royal-street. The passage referred to is Matt. cap. vii., 12 v., "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets

" S. B., Old Windsor.—If our correspondent will forward the copy it shall be exchanged.

" A widow."—No commission in the army can be purchased for the price named

" R. D. G.," Edgeware-road.—The mansion is not of sufficient interest.

" S. K. B."—Her Majesty and Prince Albert alone were in the carriage.

" J. A. E.," Brighton.—Thanks for the sketch, which shall appear.

" A Constant Subscriber," Jersey.—We are not sufficiently conversant with the law of debtor and creditor to answer our correspondent's question.

" Mr. J. Trimley," Ipswich.—Thanks for his letter; but we cannot detach the matter referred to. The application upon the other point may be addressed to the person who supplies the paper.

" G. W. F.," Aldersgate-street.—Our correspondent's obliging letter has been referred to the compiler of the Census

" Z. W., Brighton.—The imperfection in the first column, accidentally overlooked in a few copies, is what printers term a "bite," by a tape of the machine. Our correspondent's newsman will exchange the copy on question.

" A Four Months' Subscriber," Manchester, should order the town edition.

" L. B."—The cuts in the spurious almanack in question are mere copies from a set of engravings in "Home's Every-day Book," published many years since. Next week we shall give specimens of the magnificent series of engravings of the grand City Pageant, on Lord Mayor's Day; the points of view being different from those in our last year's illustration of this event.

" J. S." Oakley-square.—Queen Victoria was born on May 24, 1819, at Kensington Palace.

" H. B. ."—We know of no "farthing" of Queen Anne of the date of 1702. The trans tokens (not copper farthings, of the date 1711, to which our correspondent must refer, are worthless counters, and have caused an immense deal of trouble, and are pieces of no value whatever. In the British Museum are six distinct varieties of the farthings of Queen Anne; but the most of these are really circulated, and this is of the date of 1714, with the figure of Britannia on the reverse. The other five varieties are pattern pieces, struck for approval, but from which no coinage for circulation have been taken. Mr. Till, the respectable medallist, of Great Russell-street, Covent-garden, has written a very interesting account of the popular error of the value of a Queen Anne's farthing. See also engravings of the above in the "Mirror," vol. xxv., p. 392.

" T. B. U."—The error is corrected in the present number.

" Insurance," Dungannon, Ireland.—See No. 74 of our journal, containing the last plan of the two Houses of Parliament, with a scale. The ruler front was originally stated to occupy 870 feet in length.

We have not room for "Song of the Deserter;" "Sonnet," by E. A. D.; "Hymns," by P. W. S.; "To my Lady-bird," by August.

" J. D.," Cleveland-street, is thanked for the sketch, which did not reach us in time.

" Incognita."—We think not: certainly not in public.

" Linton," Kent.—"The Hue and Cry" may be purchased at No. 11, Cranecourt.

" A Subscriber," Portobello.—We cannot undertake to determine the genuineness of advertisements

" J. N., Manchester.—We are not aware that Captain Marryat is, at present, Editor of any newspaper.

" A Subscriber" should ask the advice of a magistrate as to the course to be taken towards a disorderly factory son.

" G. S.,"—The parochial chapelry of Witton-le-Wear, Durham, is correctly stated according to the Government Census Return, 565 inhabitants. The township of North Bedburn, containing 457 persons, is returned as forming part of the parish of St. Andrew Auckland, which the population list includes The population of the chapelry of Hamsterley is also given according to the district return; but if, as our correspondent states, it ought to include the townships of Hamsterley, Bedburn, Lynesack, and Softley, then the population will be 1,750.

THE WEEKLY CHRONICLE.—Next week will appear in our journal, a series of engravings illustrative of the recent trials in Wales, from sketches made by an artist who has visited the localities of the late riots. They are omitted this week for want of room.

CHESS.—" Q. G. K."—He must checkmate in 50 moves, or the game will be drawn.

Solutions to No 43 received from " Mr. Mayo," " Checkmate," " J. E. C.," and " Clerevus Delpovivas."

" Veritas."—We cannot give the required information.

" Q. E. D."—Received. Shall be noticed early.

Problems received from " Clericus " and " Edward."

DRAUGHTS.—" S. F."—White wins the game.

THE QUEEN AND THE NEWSBOY.—A paragraph has been going the round of the papers during the past week concerning the Queen's temporary stoppage at the Paddington Railway Station, on her Majesty's return from Cambridge, in which her Majesty's gracious condescension in beckoning a newsboy to approach her for the purpose of buying a newspaper of him, is eloquently set forth with all the attractiveness of so interesting an incident. We observe with no trifling degree of contempt the efforts that are being made by one or two obscure publications to turn this circumstance to advantage by persuading the public that theirs were the papers which her Majesty chose on the occasion, when, on inquiry, it turns out to be a sheer fabrication. The papers bought by her Majesty on the occasion alluded to were two copies of the Sunday Times (one of which her Majesty handed to Prince Albert), and one, as has been stated, Bell's Life, and some other equally attractive miscellany. If Royal patronage were the best test of excellence, the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS might have some reason to be proud, as its hebdomadal appearance is not only anxiously looked for at the Castle and Palace, but her Majesty's bookbinders have received their instructions from the "highest" quarter as to the particular manner in which our publication in its collected form should be bound. We refer to this subject, however, merely to mark our sense of the charlatanism by which some persons would endeavour to cheat their neighbours and deceive the public.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1843.

Labour and its reward! it is a good phrase, and the ideas linked with it are not disagreeable. The sentence that made labour the lot of man was not altogether a bitter one. The toil may be severe, but the compensation makes it endured with contentment, nay, with cheerfulness and absolute happiness. It is not toil that is bitter, in this stage of the world's history, but the want of it; to millions in this country the suspension of their labour, or a reduction in the amount of it, are the direst of calamities, for they bring either a curtailment of their means of living, or they render it impossible for them to live at all. Their wages are their life, and these diminished or stopped altogether, the consequences are terrible to contemplate. The toil them toil is so far from being the "primal curse," that it is rather the first great blessing. But there are many kinds of labour, and many scales of compensation. To attempt to enumerate them would be as absurd as it is impossible. They range between what we take to be the two extremes the statesman whose labour is to rule, and whose wages are not so much mere wealth, as the power over men, present fame, and the hope of future distinction—down to the pale, overworn, and sickly drudge, plying the needle in some garret of this huge, unknown and uncared for, and by all the unceasing tasking of her energies scarcely keeping herself one point above starvation. Of all the conditions in which human nature can be found reduced on earth—and afflicting enough are too many of them—this one is surely the most to be pitied. And it is pitied—widely pitied. But it is time for society to learn that its duty is to do something else besides pity; it is amiable to commiserate, but it is far better to relieve—better still to prevent. The details that have been recently published as to the manner in which the poor and industrious are plundered, are enough to excite indignation in the most indifferent. Civilization certainly breeds crimes which a savage would blush to commit; one of them, and one of the worst, is that kind of trading on the miserable necessities of others, which has been, and not undeservedly, called "white slavery." So great is the competition for labour among thousands of females, that they are found ready to work for the smallest remuneration on which it is possible—or scarcely that—to exist. It is scarcely credible that from these human ingenuity and avarice have found a means of wringing money. The establishments who give out work of the kind done by this overtasked class, have been accustomed to let it to a species of contractor, in some cases, we grieve to say, a woman, who, making herself responsible for the performance of the work, makes a profit by getting it done at a lower rate by those who must work for anything that is offered, or starve. Then comes the spectacle with which the public has been made familiar; we wish we could add; been moved,

> " Of misery o ercharged,
> And duty in its service perishing."

We do not wish to go into any explanation of the laws which undoubtedly regulate the rate of the compensation of labour; but we cannot but point out the fact that here is an element introduced which does not diminish the cost of the work to the employer, while it lessens the wages of the actual worker, for the profit of a third party who stands between them. The condition of the class subjected to such a system is actually worse than that of the slave. It is worse in this respect; that though the slave worked for the profit of another, that other was obliged to feed him. But here the slave-driver takes the profit of the toil, and cares not whether the slave is fed or not. Here then is a case where public opinion may well step in, and discountenance a practice which, if extended to other branches of business, will produce dreadful results. The Prime Minister of England is said to be engaged in devising measures that in some degree may remedy the evils—the terrible evils—that have arisen from the "middle-man" system in Ireland. But industry may be farmed as well as land, and labour is as necessary to life in England as land is in the sister kingdom. If the seekers of employment can only obtain it through some one who stands between them and the employer, it is but too plain to see the results. Poverty is bitter and "sore to bide" of itself; that it should be robbed of any portion of its miserable pittance is a disgrace to the community which permits the abstraction.

The past week has been one of political expectations, rather than of political action. In London, the excitement of the election has passed away; and business has resumed its wonted course. A statement has appeared, connected with the result of this contest, to the effect that Sir R. Peel has ordered an inquiry to be made into the causes of the defeat of Mr. Baring, and much that led to it appearing to arise from the general dissatisfaction with the manner in which the machinery of the Income-tax has been put in operation in the City, that it is understood the recent notice from the office of stamps and taxes may in some degree be attributed to a wish to make it work as smoothly as possible in future, consistently with the due collection of the tax. One of the events of the week—the opening of Term, which took place on Thursday—is interesting only to those who are unfortunate enough to require the assistance of the law. If there is any one subject that can be said to engross more attention than another, it is the Irish prosecutions. So far from the report of their having been abandoned being correct, fresh evidence has been adduced, and there is every sign of their being pressed on with the utmost vigour. In Wales the state of things is not satisfactory; large meetings of far more continue to be held, and the addresses made at those assemblies and the resolutions agreed to by them, form a strange mixture of subjects. There is an evident want of forbearance among them, but the remedies are not well understood. Thus at a large meeting held on the Penn-das-Eithen Mountain, this week, a petition to the Queen was proposed, in which political questions and social grievances are mixed up inextricably with each other. One demand is to have the costs of all legal proceedings reduced one half, and that no Clerk to a Board of Guardians be an Englishman. This is followed by a demand of the vote by ballot, and a repeal of the church rates! It is but justice to say that this petition was rejected and another carried of a much more reasonable kind. But that such demands could be proposed to an assembly of men in juxtaposition, with any idea of a practical beneficial result, is a curious circumstance. There is much to be done, we fear, in this part of the kingdom, before it can be restored to what may be called a state of tranquility. The evils to be grappled with here are, however, more social than political; a great agent in the irritation of the minds of the people seems to be the new poor laws. In the absence of any immediate subject of engrossing political interest, the London press has turned more than usual attention to the destitution and distress of the metropolis—one form of which we have treated in another article.

It was our painful and disagreeable task last week to lay before our readers the details of a disgraceful occurrence which took place in the grave-yard in Portugal-street, on the occasion of the burial of a poor man, named Jacob Burns, who was once a respectable ratepayer in the parish, and whose remains were insulted, and public decency outraged by their being ignominiously thrust into a hole hardly a fit receptacle for the carcass of a dog. Is it not enough that the means of alleying the evils of physical destitution are denied, or grudgingly doled out to the poor, but that wretchedness is abundant in the midst of plenty, but we must also drive the populace into phrenzy and excitement by such revolting indecencies towards the ashes of the dead? Not only do the poor find that they are left in their multitudinous helplessness while living to encroach on each other's subsistence, but they are compelled even to intrude on each other's coffins, disturbing the tranquility of death, and making pestiferous each other's graves. The Moloch of wealth—the idol of a money-worshipping age, to whose eager worship the greater part of the crowded metropolitan edifices may be said to be erected—will grant no additional room to the reeking receptacles in which the accumulated corses of the poor are thrown. The iron bed of the tyrant was not more unexpansive than the space afforded in crowded capitals to the purpose of pauper interment. Not only is insult offered to the dead, and indignation excited amongst the living by this state of things, but pestilential diseases are continually engendered, and sweep away their victims to the source of their own virulence. The wealthy, in the retirement and coolness of their country villas, or in their well-cleansed, well-ventilated squares, do not care for this; the tradesman, struggling for competence, is too much engrossed to heed or attempt to remedy it; and thus the foul blot on civilization and humanity proceeds until it becomes unbearable. That it has become so already, in most of the churchyards of the metropolis, has been demonstrated over and over again; and therefore we call upon parochial authorities, and on the Government, in the name of decency and humanity, to procure, if not gratuitous, at least cheap, unthronged, and unpolluted burial ground for the ashes of the poor. Much as the exercise of charity is required by the living, the evil to which we have adverted has reached to such a monstrous height, that it is equally imperative in its claim for amelioration. We trust that those who have energy and active benevolence will solicit, and those who have wealth will supply the means of putting an end to the revolting and inhuman spectacles of which the crowded state of our churchyards so constantly affords the disclosure. With respect to the recklessness, want of proper feeling, nay, gross brutality of the grave-diggers on the present occasion, we are so much now-a-days in the habit of recording instances of these qualities amongst all sorts of officials that they have ceased to excite our surprise.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

SATURDAY.—At a quarter before five o'clock, the Queen and Prince Albert and suite, arrived at the Castle from town, having travelled by a special train on the Great Western Railway.

SUNDAY.—This morning her Majesty and Prince Albert took their accustomed early walk. The Queen and Prince Albert attended Divine Service within the Castle. The ladies and gentlemen of the royal circle and the household also attended. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtnay officiated, and preached the sermon, taking his text from the 1st verse of the 17th chapter of the 1st Book of Kings

MONDAY.—The Grand Duke Michael arrived at the Castle shortly before six o'clock in the evening, on a visit to the Queen. The following company were honoured with invitations, and arrived at the Castle during the day, viz., Baron Brunow, the Earl of Jersey, Sir James Graham, Sir H Wheatley, and Mr. and Mrs. Stanley. The Hon. Miss Murray and the Hon. Miss Lister arrived, succeeding the Hon. Miss Stanley and the Hon. Miss Hamilton as maids of honour in waiting on her Majesty.

TUESDAY.—His Imperial Highness, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, went in a carriage and four from the Castle to Eton College, about half-past twelve o'clock. The Rev. Dr. Hawtrey, head master of the college, the Rev Mr. Green, and the Rev. Mr. Wilder, two of the fellows, received their royal and imperial highnesses on arriving at the college, a quarter before one o'clock, and conducted the distinguished party through the upper and lower schools, and also the long chamber, the provost's lodge, and the library. Some of the splendid works of the fine collection in the library obtained particular attention from the illustrious visitors. After remaining a considerable time in the college, the royal party took their departure. The pupils of the college heartily welcomed the persons on their arrival. The Grand Duke, Prince Albert, and the suite returned to the Castle to lunch. His Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael took leave of her Majesty and her illustrious consort, and quitted the Castle soon after three o'clock, on his return to town, and proceeded to the Slough station, travelling to the metropolis by the Great Western Railway. Sir James Graham, Sir Henry Wheatley, Mr. and the Hon. Miss Stanley, also left the Castle.

WEDNESDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert walked for a short time on the terrace. The Prince afterwards went out shooting in the royal preserves in the Great Park. His Royal Highness was attended by Sir Frederick Stovin, Colonel Wylde, and Mr. C. E. Anson. The royal party had some excellent sport, and returned to the Castle to luncheon. At a quarter past five o clock his Royal Highness Prince Alexander of the Netherlands, attended by Baron Sloet and Mons. Dedel, arrived at the Castle, on a visit to her Majesty. His Royal Highness travelled to Slough by the Great Western Railway, where one of her Majesty's carriages was in readiness to convey him to the Castle. Baron and Baroness Gerard also arrived at the same time. The Dowager Lady Lyttelton, the Rev. Lord Wrottesley Russel, and Mr. George Edward and the Hon. Mrs. Anson joined the royal dinner circle.

THE GRAND DUKE MICHAEL.—On Saturday afternoon his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael, accompanied by his Excellency Baron Brunow and Count Woronzo, went to Apsley House, to visit the Duke of Wellington. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, attended by Baron Knesebeck, and his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael of Russia, attended by his suite, honoured his Excellency Baron Brunow with their company at dinner, on Saturday, at Ashburnham House. His Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael returned to Mivart's Hotel, at half-past five o'clock on Tuesday afternoon, from visiting the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, at Windsor Castle. We understand that Dr. Wylie, by her Majesty's command, shortly after the Grand Duke's arrival on Monday afternoon at the Castle, was ushered into the royal presence, and the Queen, after a few brief complimentary remarks, stated it was her Majesty's wish that before that gentleman's departure from this country he should receive some mark of the royal favour, and the Queen was graciously pleased, in the presence of Prince Albert and a select circle of the royal household, to confer on the respected doctor the honour of knighthood. Dr. Wylie is nephew of Sir James Wylie, bart., M.D., premier physician of the late and present Emperor of Russia, and head of the medical staff of Russia, in whose service he has been upwards of fifty years. He (Sir James), in 1814, was knighted by George IV., then Prince Regent, at Ascot Races, and subsequently created a baronet. In the evening his Imperial Highness received his Royal Highness Prince Alexander of the Netherlands, attended by Baron Sloet, M. Benkhausen, and a select circle at dinner. On Wednesday his Imperial Highness personally paid visits to Viscount and Viscountess Canning, Viscount and Viscountess Lillon, Duke of Devonshire, Earl of Jersey, Sir Augustus and Lady Clifford, &c. The Grand Duke closed his visits by waiting upon Baroness Brunow, at Ashburnham House, where his Imperial Highness took his farewell of the Baroness. His Imperial Highness gave a sumptuous entertainment to a circle of twenty, at Mivart's Hotel, on Wednesday evening.

THE DUC DE BORDEAUX.—The distinguished scion of the Bourbons visited Glasgow on Friday se'nnight, in company with three gentlemen of his suite, his Grace the Duke of Hamilton, and Sir Archibald Succoth. After visiting various places of interest in the city, his Royal Highness left for Hamilton Palace, from whence he had come. His Royal Highness is expected in London about the 15th instant.

We understand that M. de Berenger, the celebrated French advocate, arrived in town on Tuesday, en route for Alton Towers, the seat of the Earl of Shrewsbury, to meet his Royal Highness the Duke of Bordeaux.

DEATH OF LORD RODNEY.—We have to announce the death of Lord Rodney, the intelligence of whose demise has been received in town. The noble lord expired at Berrington-hall, his seat in Herefordshire, on Monday last. The deceased was second son of George, second Lord Rodney, and brother of the late peer, whom he succeeded in 1841. He was born on the 12th of April, 1784, and was unmarried. The title now devolves upon his nephew, Robert Dunnett Rodney, son of the Hon. Captain Robert Rodney, Lieutenant in the Scots Fusilier Guards, born in May, 1820.

WALMER.—The Duke of Wellington returned to the Castle on Saturday evening from Apsley House, having gone to town to receive the Grand Duke Michael. His grace is expected shortly to proceed to Strathfieldsaye, where he will enjoy the diversion of hunting with Sir John Cope's or the Vine hounds.

The Earl and Countess Grey are entertaining a select circle at their hospitable mansion at Howick The venerable earl is greatly improved in health, and almost daily takes carriage drives in the grounds of Howick Hall.

THE DUC DE BORDEAUX.—We understand that magnificent preparations are making at Alton Towers, by the Earl of Shrewsbury, for the reception of his Royal Highness the Duke of Bordeaux. Besides the suite of his Royal Highness, which consists of le Duc de Levis, Due Descars, l'Amiral Villarsi Joyeuse, and M de Barante, the following distinguished compatriots of the illustrious visitor will be assembled to receive him:—La Duchesse de Levis, la Marquis and la Marquise de Pastoret, le Prince de Robecq Montmorenci, Duc de Guiche, Vicomte de Chateaubrand, &c. The noble earl and countess have also invited a distinguished circle of English nobility and gentry for the whole period of his Royal Highness's visit, which, we understand, will extend to about ten days.

LORD W. PAGET AND LORD CARDIGAN.—The grand jury, at the recent sitting of the Central Criminal Court, returned a true bill for misdemeanour against the Age newspaper, for a libel on the family of the former noble lord, in which the name of the latter was mixed up.

LORD W. HERVEY.—We are authorised to state that Lord W. Hervey is to be Secretary to the Embassy at Paris, in the place of Mr. H. Bulwer, appointed to succeed Mr. Aston, at Madrid.

His Royal Highness Prince Alexander of the Netherlands was visited on Saturday, at Mivart's, by the Earl of Jersey, Viscount Canning, Prince Baratinsky, Sir H. Webster, Count Rohan de Chabot, Mr. Addington, Earl of Lincoln, Sir George Murray, Honourable Sidney Herbert, his Excellency Baron Brunoff, Viscount Hawarden. The Prince, we hear, is making many purchases of British manufactures, to take with him to the Hague, and amongst the number are two very superb carriages.

LIFE IN WALES.—Gay doings have lately taken place at Llanover, the mansion of Sir Benjamin and Lady Hall, near Abergavenny; several light dramatic pieces have been performed in a highly creditable manner. The festivities were concluded with a grand fancy ball, which was attended by 200 nobility and gentry. Several of the company appeared in the picturesque costume of the peasantry of Gwent and Morgan-wg. Welsh reels and jigs were danced with great spirit to the cheerful strains of two Welsh harps; and a party of native minstrels sung several pretty melodies, harmonised, with excellent effect. The entertainments continued for four days, and the scene was rendered very gay by the presence of the military officers quartered at Newport, Brecon, Merthyr, Pontypool, &c. &c.

The Earl of Aberdeen arrived in town on Monday from Sir R. Peel's, at Drayton. Sir H. Hardinge has arrived at Badgebury, the seat of Viscount Beresford. The Earl of Lincoln has arrived in town from Nottingham. Sir J. Graham left town on Monday on a visit to her Majesty at Windsor.

The first Cabinet dinner since the prorogation of Parliament, which was to have taken place at the residence of Sir James Graham, in Hill-street, Berkeley-square, on Wednesday, the 8th of November, is postponed until Wednesday, the 15th

The Attorney and Solicitor Generals arrived in town on Monday from Wales On Tuesday morning the hon. and learned gentlemen had a long interview with Sir James Graham at the Home Office. Sir Thomas Fremantle also had an interview with the right hon. baronet at the Home Office

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—On Monday, Simon Watson Taylor, Esq., of Edinburgh, was united to the Right Hon. Lady Charlotte Hay, daughter of the Marquis of Tweeddale. The ceremony took place at Walmer Church, and the Rev. W. B. Holland, M.A., Perpetual Curate, officiated on the occasion. Amongst the bridal party present were the Duke of Wellington, Earl and Countess Dalhousie, Lord John Hay, Marquis and Marchioness of Douro, Earl and Countess Wilton, Lord Gifford, Algernon Greville, Esq., Emilius Watson Taylor, Esq., C. Watson, Esq., &c., &c. The bride was given away by Lord Dalhousie. Miss Hope Vere was the bridesmaid. After the conclusion of the ceremony, a most recherche déjeûner was provided at Deal Castle, by the noble host and hostess, Lord and Lady Dalhousie, at which all whose names are above mentioned were present. Soon after the happy pair set off on a wedding excursion.

On Monday the Lord Mayoress and the Lady Mayoress gave a splendid entertainment on the occasion of the christening of their youngest son, who was born at the commencement of the mayoralty. The sponsors were Lord Worsley, Lord Viscount Torrington, General Dyson, and Mrs. Wigan. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. F. Swanton, of Winchester, by special licence, at the Mansion-house, the church of St. Olave, Southwark, in which fourteen of the Lord Mayor's children had been baptised, having been burnt down.

SHERIFFS' FUND.—A meeting of the subscribers to this fund was held at the London Coffee House on Tuesday, when considerable discussion was created by the non-production of the accounts, during the period of Mr. Ald. Gibbs's shrivalty. This is the only instance on record of the sheriff treating the fund as a private one, and refusing to render an account.

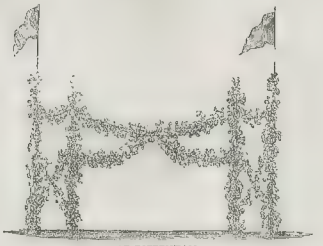
THE ROYAL VISIT TO CAMBRIDGE.

The visit of her most gracious Majesty to her ancient and now thrice honoured University of Cambridge, has not passed away without filling the hearts of all her loyal subjects who witnessed her entrance, or heard of it, with joy, as being productive of the best consequences to those dear and long-cherished objects which she did honour to her own gentle heart by honouring. It was a visit of which learning may be proud, and from which religion may derive consolation. In commingling, as our beloved Queen did, with a grace and dignity peculiarly her own, in the scenes which have been hallowed by the footsteps of genius, and participating in their glorious associations, she rendered them still more sacred in the eyes of those who already looked upon them with a sort of natural veneration. In consenting to the investiture, in her own presence, of her august Consort with the scarlet robe of the university, she sanctioned the opinion that there is no one already so honoured who may not receive more honour by worshipping at learning's ancient shrine. Granta has good reason to be proud of the high favour which has been conferred upon her, and to record it in the brightest page of her annals; and well may she say that of all former occasions when a sovereign of England visited her classic precincts, none was marked by more true splendour, none by more manifestations of genuine loyalty, none by more general diffusion of joy.

In our last number we gave an elaborate account of the interesting and imposing ceremony which took place in the Senate House, as well as of the various proceedings throughout the town and university which marked the auspicious occasion. We also afforded the public illustrations of many of these from drawings taken by our artists on the spot. Some striking ones remained to be delineated and dwelt upon, which task we lose no time in performing, but proceed at once to lay before our readers.

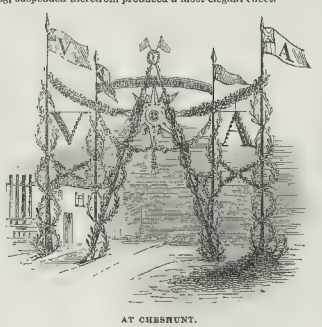
TRIUMPHAL ARCHES.

We cannot resume our account of the royal visit better than by sketches of the principal arches erected upon the route, to commemorate the event. First is one of the arches



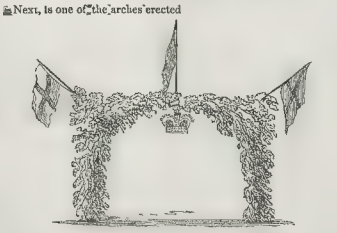
AT TOTTENHAM.

The preparations at Waltham Cross were described and illustrated in our last week's number. Proceeding onward to Cheshunt-street, Messrs. Paul and Sons had erected opposite their nursery four poles thirty feet high, with a flag flying on each. These were very tastefully decorated with various evergreens and exotics hanging in festoons, and two wreaths or chains of their far-famed roses, each twenty feet long, suspended therefrom produced a most elegant effect.



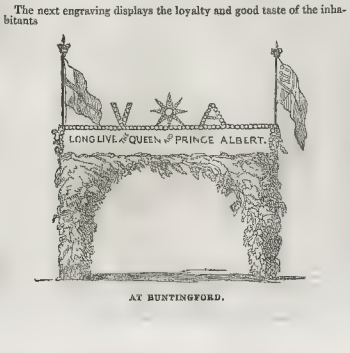
AT CHESHUNT.

Next, is one of the arches erected



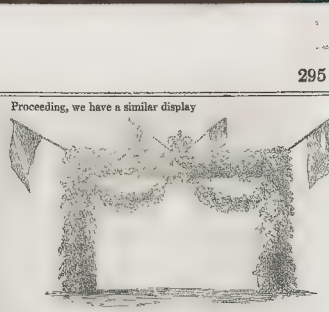
AT WARE.

The next engraving displays the loyalty and good taste of the inhabitants



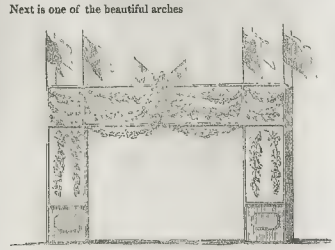
AT BUNTINGFORD.

Proceeding, we have a similar display



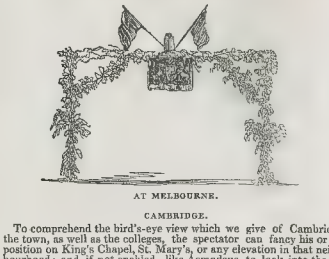
AT READ MILL-HILL.

Next is one of the beautiful arches



AT ROYSTON.

And lastly, a like commemoration



AT MELBOURNE.

CAMBRIDGE.

To comprehend the bird's-eye view which we give of Cambridge, the town, as well as the colleges, the spectator can fancy his or her position on King's Chapel, St. Mary's, or any elevation in that neighbourhood; and, if not enabled, like Asmodeus, to look into the domestic circles of the colleges themselves, to have a commanding view of their quadrangles.

The town of Cambridge, in the architectural distinction of some of its university lions, such as King's College chapel, the Fitzwilliam Museum, Trinity College hall, &c. &c., and its beautiful college grounds, can challenge comparison with the seat of the sister university. The most regular part of the town is the line of streets along which her Majesty proceeded in state, after her entrance from Trumpington. This little village is about one mile distant from Trumpington-street, and is recollected by all who have laughed heartily over the metrical tale connected with it by the father of English poetry. There is another line of street somewhat parallel with the one just alluded to, with the peculiar straightness of which the eye is struck: this commences on entering the town by Regent-street, and proceeding by St. Andrew's-street, and along Bridge-street. This straightness is owing to the line having been, as antiquarians assert, a part of the extensive Roman road from Colchester to Chester, which passed through or by the Roman station at this place.* This spot the Romans fixed on, as being a gently sloping hill turned to the south, with a river running near its foot, and commanding an extensive view over a level country.

Dyer remarks in his work on Cambridge, that "perhaps no town in England is of such perfect flatness from Peter House to Magdalene College." We do not agree with the university historian, and can only account for his idea of such unmitigated flatness by his having conceived it during the long vacation. The origin of Cambridge is lost in the night of time. Antiquaries yield the honour of age to Oxford, and she is always recognised as the sister university; but from time to time some enthusiastic son or other of Granta has stood out for the superior age of his Alma Mater. The following quaint production, which is copied from a manuscript in the public library at Cambridge, as it speaks of Cantaber, or Cantabros, the supposed founder, will be found amusing from its style, and interesting from its exceeding rarity, if it cannot be depended upon for its historical accuracy. It is stated to be written by an old Cantab, named John Lydgate.

All his wits he greatlye did applie,
To have acquaintance, by great affection,
With folke experte in philosophie
From Athenes he brought with him downe
Philosophers, most sovereigne of renowne,
Unto Cambridge. Playlye, this is the case.
Anaxemander and Anaxagoras,
With other verye authours doth fare
To Cambridge; fast gan him spede
With philosophers, and let for no cost spare
In the schooles to studie and to rede.
Of whose teaching great profit gan spread,
And great increase rose of his doctrine.
Thus of Cambridge the name gan first shyne
As cheefe schoole and Universitie
Unto this tyme from the day it began.
By deare reporte in many a fre countre,
Unto the reign of Cassibelan,
A woorthie Prynce and full knightelle man,
As sayne Chronicles, who with his mightie hand
Let Julius Cesar to arrive in this land,
Five hundredth year full thirtie year and twentie.
Fro Babylon a unassmighnian,
That Cassibelan reigned in Britaine;
Which by his notable discreeon,
To increase that studdie of great attention,
I mean of Cambridge the Universitie,
Franchised with many a libertie,
By dear reporte in many a fre countre,
From countries about many one
Devers scholers, by delight labour,
Made their resorte of great affection:
To that stoodie great plenty there cam downe
To gather fruits of wisdom and science
And sunshine flowers of sugred eloquence.
And as it is put eke in memorie,
How Julius Cesar, entering this region
Of Cassibelan after his victorye,
Took with him clarks of famous renowne,
Fro Cambridge, and led them to Rome towne;
Thus by processe remembered heretofore,
Cambridge was founded long or CHRIST was borne:
Five hundred yere, twentie, and eke nine:
In this matter ye gete no more of me;
Rehearse I will no more at this tyme.

So much for the antiquity of Cambridge, and it is enough in all conscience It is only to be wondered so far that the pious John Lydgate did not celebrate the writing of the unequalled commentaries of Julius Cæsar by one of these same Cambridge "clarks of famous renowne," insinuating that no human being could handle then the sword and the pen so well together. Graver histories state that the university was founded in Edward the First's time, and that the first authentic charter is dated in the reign of Henry the Third. The university statutes in force have been so since Elizabeth's time, who gave them to the university in the twelfth year of her reign. Who has not heard of the Cam, with its drooping willows, its sedgy banks, and its sleepy waters? Who that is acquainted with the works of the bards who have celebrated it cannot fancy himself floating down its gentle wave, or strolling by its classic margo? He should see both its banks and its waters on some day in April when a university boat race takes place, when its silence and seclusion are changed for the bustle and broil of one of Homer's battles. And speaking of the bards who have celebrated it, some of them have not been so complimentary to it. We can only make room for a quotation or two from the greatest of those who have either praised or decried old Camus.

"Nuda nec arva placent, umbrataque nemora recusso
Quam mollit Phœbicollis convenit iste locus. —MILTON
"Jam nec arundiferum mihi cura revisere Camum. —MILTON
Si quoque successu Cami remeare paludes —MILTON

PORTRAIT OF PRINCE ALBERT, D.C.L.

Cowley, on the other hand, shows himself at once more pious and polite—

Oh! sacri fontes, oh! sacræ valibus umbræ!
Quas recreat ætium Pieridumque chori!
Oh! Camus, Phœbo nullus quo gratior amnis
Amnibus aurifluis invidiosus inops!

The one thought no place so delightful as Cambridge, and no river so calculated for poetic inspiration as the Cam. The other thought the contrary. To Cowley, Cambridge presented nothing but bona gaudia, doctam quietem; from Milton one hears nothing but the duri verba magistri, and the murmur rancæ scholæ, which shows that poets, like doctors, disagree. Byron had no great regard for Cambridge no more than he had for Horace, for whom he was whipped at Harrow. The following anecdote of the noble bard's veneration for his university, and for his own particular college, is not generally known - Lord Byron occupied rooms in a corner in the old Court of Trinity, and during a portion of his Freshman year kept a huge bear there for his amusement. His lordship thought he escaped the law of the college, which forbade dogs only from entering within its precincts; and Bruin was confined moreover to the tower, in which his lordship's rooms were situated. One fine summer's evening, however, as his lordship and some of his many companions were sipping their wine and smoking their cigars, with the window of the chief apartment open, and the grotesque animal sitting on the window sill, with nothing more or less than a cap and gown on him, the Dean of the College passed by. Observing the strange, and, to him, provoking picture, he immediately sent for Lord Byron, and asked him in an angry tone what he meant by such an insult to the college. "What business, my lord," said the reverend functionary, "has a bear in Trinity College?" "He is reading for a fellowship" was the instant reply. "I'd have you to know, my lord, that such an insult——" "Mr. Dean, I beg your pardon, not for a Trinity Fellowship, but for a Johnian one!" "Oh, indeed, that alters the case, but pray send him to St. John's!" There was at this time a fierce feud between the two colleges, and from time immemorial the greatest possible jealousy has existed between them.

THE QUEEN RECEIVING THE ADDRESSES, IN THE GREAT HALL, AT TRINITY.

The Cam is said to have run originally through the second court, or present cloisters of Trinity, under the Library, which last-mentioned noble building, it is also stated, stands on ground belonging to the Town Corporation, and held by lease. Tradition says also that the present course of the Cam was only a branch or bye-stream, till enlarged for the convenience perhaps of its navigation. A plan of improvement for the course of the Cam was offered some years ago, by the Rev. J. Ashby, B.D., late Senior Fellow of St. John's, and is to be seen at the Public Library. This proposed, amongst other things, to free the river from its present summer-houses and the brick walls which enclose it for the best part of its way through the colleges. Mr. Ashby remarks, that "Had the river continued to run in its regular old curvature, it would have enclosed the half of the town more completely and gracefully than at present; that is, had it gone a little distant from the grounds belonging to St. John's College to the foot of Castle-hill and passing on between Magdalene College and St. Giles's Church, fallen into its present course; in this case, it would not have directed its stream against the corner of St. John's College Walks, an inconvenience that is said to have been increased by removing the river from Trinity College to enlarge its site."

We annex here our artist's detailed description of our large

PANORAMIC VIEW.

The Queen entered Trumpington-street, passing under the triumphal arch seen nearly at the top of the main street, on the right hand of the view. The large building on the left side of the street, a little below the arch, is the Fitzwilliam Museum, the finest modern building in Cambridge: of the principal front an engraving will be found in No. 77 of our journal. The interior is not yet completed.

Somewhat lower down, on the same side of the street, is St. Peter's College formerly called Peter-house, founded early in the 13th century.

On the opposite side of the street is the Chapel of Pembroke College. The buildings of this College are ancient; the founder was the widow of the Earl of Pembroke, who was murdered in France, A.D. 1323.

Nearly opposite Pembroke College is the University Printing Office, called "The Pitt Press." This building was designed by Bloro: the tower was, as fenced parapet and crocketed pinnacles, forms a handsome ornament to this part of the street. The Pitt Press was first opened on the 30th of April, 1833.

On the right hand of the street, a little below the Pitt Press, is St. Botolph's Church. The large building on the same side of the way, next to the church, is Corpus Christi College, founded A.D. 1352. The new quadrangle is an elegant structure; the front facing the street is 222 feet in length.

Opposite Corpus Christi College, nearly hidden from view by a grove of lofty elms, stands Catherine Hall, founded A.D. 1475. After passing Catherine Hall, the street becomes considerably wider and on the left are seen the magnificent buildings of King's College, with Chapel towering above all the buildings of the university. Adjoining the Chapel is the Library; and near it the Senate House

On the opposite side of the street, near Corpus Christi College, is seen the square tower of the Church of St. Benedict, usually called St. Bennet's. Nearly opposite King's College Chapel stands great St. Mary's, the university church. At a short distance from this church, in the same line, are round Trinity-street. On the left stands Caius College; and nearly at the end of the street, on the same side, is the entrance to Trinity College, the largest establishment in Cambridge. In the centre of the large quadrangle is seen the splendid fountain. The building immediately opposite the entrance-tower, is the LODGE, in which are the apartments where her Majesty and Prince Albert sojourned, in their late visit to Cambridge.

Large as is our view, it does not afford space for the first and second quadrangle of St. John's College, which adjoins Trinity College. Parts of the back building and the elegant Gothic bridge are shown: the latter leads to the new buildings of St. John's College, on the left bank of the Cam. Our readers must now suppose themselves in the pleasure grounds and academic groves of St. John's, Trinity, Clare Hall, and King's College: these grounds are entered from each other, and are open to all, forming a continuous park or pleasure ground. The bridge crossing the Cam, to the various colleges—the rich foliage—and the superb architectural assemblage—render the banks of the Cam, at this point, one of the richest scenes in Europe. The last bridge but one over the Cam leads to Queen's College, a very ancient foundation. The Cam is navigable for barges, &c. beyond the last bridge, and here are seen large warehouses for grain, coal, &c.

KING'S COLLEGE CHAPEL.

In passing down the King's Parade, her Majesty was peculiarly struck with the magnificent picture presented to her view by the finest Gothic chapel in the world. Shortly after her arrival, as we have already noted in our account of the royal progress, the Queen and Prince Albert had an opportunity of admiring its internal splendour, when proceeding to attend divine service within its walls. His Royal Highness, in particular, so much admired the glorious pile, that he paid it two private visits on the following day.

A good deal of controversy, that perhaps might as well have been avoided, has taken place, as to the propriety of placing her Majesty's throne with its back to the altar. This we leave to the divines, as, in our opinion, the maxim of a journalist in such cases should be "Davus sum non Œdipus." When Queen Elizabeth attended divine service within the unrivalled fane, the arrangements, according to Matthew Stokyes, were as follows:—Entering the chapel, under a canopy, her Majesty knelt down between the two doors, north and south —

Then the provost, revested in a rich cope of needlework, standing about four yards from the Queen, directly towards the quire, in the middle of his company, kneeling of both sides, made his obeysance and curtesies three times, coming towards her Majestie. At the last kneeling of her stoole he kissed her hand, and pointed out the psalme "Deus Misereatur," inquiring whether it would please her Majestie to answer and say with him? And understanding that she would pray privately, in likewise privately said the said psalme, and after took his stoole for the Queen. Which done, the whole quire began to sing, in English, a song of gladness, and so went orderly into their stalls in the quire, the Queen following and going into her travys under the canopy, and marvellously rejoicing at the beauty of the chappel, greatly praised it, and above all other in her realme. This song ended, the provost began the "Te Deum" in English, in his cope, which was solemnly sung in like-song, and the organs playing. After that he began evensong, every man standing in his cope. Which being ended, her Majestie came forth of her travys, and went towards the lodging by a privy way made through the window of the north vestry door, as before.

Dyer in his history applies this motto to the magnificent structure:

Ut rosa flos florum, sic est domus ista domorum.
As stands the rose, the flower of flowers,
Midst chapels so this chapel of ours.

Cromwell quartered his cavalry in the ante-chapel, and his human brutes chopped the noses and wings off the angels as far as they could reach upwards with their impious weapons.

Cole, who was a Clare Hall man, and a most indefatigable university antiquarian, was of opinion that Henry VI. himself laid the foundation stone of this magnificent building. He says, however, after having quoted some verses which bear on this position in "Fuller's Church History," that these were not original lines, but a translation. Dyer, in his "History of the University," inserts the original Latin ones, for the sake of the translation, which are of themselves, so to speak, original enough:—

PRINCE ALBERT'S DEGREE.

The scarlet robe in which his Royal Highness was invested on the occasion of his taking his Doctor's degree, is the usual honourable gown in the university. Ordinary persons cannot obtain a degree from the learned academic body without having undergone the usual examination before their first degree in Divinity, Law, Physic, or Arts, the other degrees being mere honorary distinctions of course, in order of time. The university, however, sometimes confers degrees, without examination or residence, on such individuals of mature age as are illustrious by birth, or who have rendered great services to the state, or to the cause of literature. Such personages thus honoured have not a vote in the Senate House.

TRINITY COLLEGE HALL.

This hall, one of the finest of the description in the world, is built after the model of Westminster, to which alone it yields pre-eminence. It is the dining or banqueting-room of the college, and is used on occasions of state, when the Sovereign visits the university. On a throne and dais, placed on the platform at the upper end, where the Fellows' table usually stands, her Majesty sat and received the various addresses presented to her from the university, town, county, and various bodies, lay and clerical, who vied with each other in the expression of respectful and affectionate loyalty.

Trinity College was founded by Henry VIII., in 1546, who, to form it, seized upon Michael's Hall, King's Hall, and Physwicke's Hostle, and consolidated them together. King's Hall was the best landed foundation in the university. Queen Mary additionally endowed it, adding to its revenues near £400 a year. She wished to have prayers said for the good of her father's soul, about which she professed to be very uneasy; but some of her clergy told her that the Pope would never consent to such honour being paid to the memory of one who had been so notorious a schismatic. (See Fuller.) They persuaded her, however, to endow a Hall in favour of Arthuse, which, they assured her Majesty, was the best monument her bluff father had left behind him. Doctor Thomas Neville, the eighth Master of the College, added to it considerably, expending £3000 on the beautiful court which bears his name, making it, as Fuller says, "the stateliest and most uniform college in Christendom, out of which may be carved three Dutch universities." is the subject of the next illustration, showing the royal progress to the Senate House.

TRINITY-STREET

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE.

The gate of this celebrated college is the most beautiful in the university, and, as an exquisite and elaborate piece of carving, cannot be surpassed by any similar piece of workmanship, ancient or modern, in the world.

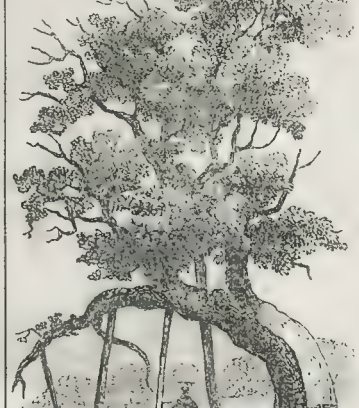
The courts of St. John's College, although not, taking them altogether, so strikingly beautiful as those of Trinity, yet present a venerable and interesting appearance. Passing out also from the old red-brick buildings to the new court, with its handsome cloisters and screen fronting the Cam, has a very agreeable effect. St. John's has ever been the rival of Trinity in the race for academic honours, the two colleges running neck and neck for the Senior Wranglership; and in latter years, since the institution of the Classical Tripos, for the head of that honour list also. In the latter, Trinity manages to bear away the palm; but in the former, among the list drawn from the year 1800, St. John's has one or two Senior Wranglers ahead.

THE ROUND CHURCH.

This beautiful old pile, called of old the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, has been renovated, under the supervision of the Camden Society, which has done much, in a very short time, towards the restoration of a classic taste in church architecture. The interior of the sacred edifice presents an exceedingly beautiful appearance, and was, as it justly deserved to be, spoken of in terms of praise and satisfaction by her Majesty and his Royal Highness. The entire restoration of the church has been executed at the expense of the Camden Society, with the exception of £300 raised by parish rate; but the sum of £1,200 is still wanting to complete the three aisles of the church in a suitable manner.

FIREWORKS.

The next illustration represents the magnificent display of fireworks on Parker's Piece.



MILTON'S MULBERRY TREE.

This revered memorial is in the garden of Christ's College, where it was planted by the hand of Milton, when a student of the College. It was visited by Prince Albert, his Royal Royal Highness having expressed particular interest concerning it. The trunk is much decayed from age, but part of it is covered with sheet lead, and elsewhere the venerable relic is supported by props.

TERMINATION OF HER MAJESTY'S PROGRESS.

In our last we reported her Majesty's arrival at Wimpole, and her reception there by the Lord Lieutenant of Cambridgeshire, the Earl of Hardwicke, on Thursday evening. At seven o'clock the royal party sat down to dinner. Covers were laid for twenty-four; and there were present her Majesty the Queen, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Earl and Countess of Hardwicke, the Countess of Mount Edgecumbe, the Hon. Eleanor Stanley, the Duke of Rutland, the Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby, the Marquis of Exeter, the Earl and Countess of Delaware, the Earl of Caledon, Lord and Lady Canning, the Hon. Elliott Yorke, M.P., and Mrs. Yorke, the Hon. and Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Yorke, Colonel the Hon. G. Grey, Colonel Bouverie, Hon. G. F. Anson, Captain Hart, R.N.

The Queen and the Prince occupied the centre of the table, the Prince sitting on the left hand side of the Queen; Lord Hardwicke sat on her right, and the Countess on the left of Prince Albert. But on Friday the Queen sat on the left hand side of the Prince, the Earl of Hardwicke sitting at her Majesty's left hand, and the Countess sitting on the right of the Prince. Her Majesty wore a crimson brocaded dress, with two camellias in her hair. She also wore the magnificent rows of pearl, which, if we mistake not, were once claimed by the King of Hanover.

Dinner was ordered for half-past seven in the grand dining-room. The table presented a magnificent service of plate. Opposite her Majesty and the Prince was placed a piece of plate of very elaborate and exquisite workmanship, representing St. Michael overcoming the dragon. This ornament is in frosted silver, and was upon a polished fluted pedestal of silver. On either side of it was a handsome large silver ewer, of fine workmanship. There were also four magnificent fruit-stands of a very costly description, and the room was lit with four immense candelabra of silver, each with six branches, and also another light in the centre. In the room was a beautiful frosted silver figure of "Hebe," and another of "Fame," the pedestal of which is an imitation of lapis lazuli. The sideboards were laid out with handsome gold and silver plate, and there was also on the sideboard a handsome cup of silver, into which were corked no less than 95 medals that had been presented to the first Lord Cornwallis.

The Queen retired to rest at an early hour, the apartments allotted to her Majesty and the Prince being the Countess of Hardwicke's own bed-room, boudoir, and the rooms en suite.

FRIDAY.

This morning her Majesty, accompanied by the Prince, and attended by the Earl and Countess of Hardwicke, Lady Mount-Edgecumbe, the Hon. Miss Stanley, Colonel Bouverie, and Mr. Anson, heard prayers in the chapel attached to the mansion at Wimpole. Mr. Anson, went to a place distant in the park, called Cobb's-wood, to shoot. His Royal Highness had not intended to shoot while at Wimpole, and no guns had been provided of his own; but as the opportunity for some good sport offered itself, he availed himself of it, and used the guns of the Hon. Messrs. Yorke. The Prince was exactly one hour and a quarter shooting, and during that time he killed seventeen pheasants, a brace of hares, and four rabbits. His Royal Highness did not miss one shot. Mr. Anson loaded for him.

It was on the Prince's return from Cobb's-wood, and after her Majesty had partaken of luncheon at 2 (which is, in fact, her dinner), that the Queen left Lord Delaware's and Bourne. The Prince accompanied her Majesty on horseback. While at Bourne her Majesty went over the place, and was particularly interested with the mantel-piece there, which has been removed from Haslingfold, where it was when Queen Elizabeth stopped one night during her Royal progresses. When her Majesty left for Bourne, she went out at the great park gate of Wimpole, and proceeded by the main road, where she was cheered most enthusiastically by crowds of inhabitants of the neighbourhood, who were assembled at different places by the way-side. Her Majesty returned by another road, and entered the park by the old town.

The Royal dinner party on Friday consisted of the Earl and Countess of Hardwicke, the Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby, Earl of Caledon, Viscount and Viscountess Canning, the Bishop of Ely, the Hon. E. Yorke and Mr. Yorke, the Hon. and Rev. Henry Yorke and Mrs. Yorke, the Hon. Grantham Yorke and Mrs. Yorke, Earl Delaware, Mr. Greene, the High Sheriff of Cambridgeshire; Mr. Allix, M.P.; Mr. Eaton, M.P.; Colonel Grey, Colonel Bouverie, Mr. Anson, the Countess of Mount-Edgecumbe, and the Hon. Miss Stanley.

Neither the Duke of Rutland nor the Marquis of Exeter dined with the Queen on Friday. They both left on Friday morning for Newmarket.

THE BALL.

The rooms thrown open to the company in the evening extended over almost the whole ground-floor of the mansion. The distance from the conservatory at the west end to the entrance of the chapel at the east end, is 200 feet. The space is occupied by the gallery—a splendid room, 65 feet by 20—the library, which is filled with many very rare and valuable objects, and dining, drawing, and reception rooms. The whole of the suite of rooms, some of them filled with pictures and statues of rare value and execution, and containing furniture of the most costly and elegant description, was brilliantly lit up on the occasion, and the effect was truly magnificent, more especially in the ball and supper-room, which will be described hereafter.

The invitations to the ball included the chief gentry of landed property in the county. The most distinguished members of the university were also invited.

The Lord Chief Justice Doherty, of the Common Pleas in Ireland, accompanied by Mrs. and Miss Doherty, being on their way from London to Dublin, diverged to Wimpole to pay their respects to her Majesty. They were among the guests at the ball.

The guests continued to arrive in rapid succession from half-past 9 o'clock. They came through the two south rooms which the Queen had occupied in the morning, and assembled in the room called the Great Library, opposite the chief door of the ball-room, where they were received by the Hon. Elliott Yorke, Mrs. Elliott Yorke, the Hon. and Rev. Henry Yorke, and Mrs. H. Yorke, the Earl and Countess of Hardwicke being at that time in attendance on her Majesty.

At about 10 o'clock the Earl of Hardwicke entered, and announced to the guests assembled in the Great Library, that her Majesty would be in the ball-room in a moment. As her Majesty and the Prince would have to pass through the library in proceeding from their own apartments to the ball-room the company formed two lines, through which her Majesty and his Royal Highness passed to the ball-room, preceded by the Lord Chamberlain, and attended by the Countess of Mount-Edgecumbe, the Hon. Miss Stanley, Colonel Bouverie, Viscount and Viscountess Canning, the Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby, and Mr. Anson. At the south end of the ball-room there was a raised throne (or rather a seat capable of holding more than one, in order to accommodate any one whom her Majesty might honour), and to this throne her Majesty proceeded, Weippert's band playing the National Anthem as she passed. The company followed her Majesty into the ball-room.

Dancing commenced soon after ten o'clock. Her Majesty first danced with the Earl of Hardwicke, and the set was composed of the Prince and Lady Hardwicke, Lord Canning and the Hon. Mrs. Henry Yorke, and Lady Canning and Mr. Anson. As soon as this first quadrille was over, dancing commenced generally—that is to say, there was one set in each of the three divisions of the room already described. The Queen danced twice besides when she danced with Lord Hardwicke. Her Majesty first danced with the Earl of Caledon, and secondly with Viscount Canning. Prince Albert danced also with Mrs. Henry Yorke and with Mrs. Grantham Yorke.

In the course of the evening her Majesty passed down the whole length of the ball-room into the ante-library, which is on the left. Here a very beautiful scene presented itself. The ante-library opens with immense plate-glass doors upon the conservatory. The conservatory was brilliantly illuminated with variegated lights, and the effect, when viewed from the darkened library, was enchanting. Her Majesty, who remained some time contemplating the scene, appeared greatly to admire it. After leaving the conservatory, her Majesty and the Prince returned up the ball-room to the throne.

At 12 o'clock her Majesty retired from the ball-room. This was understood to put an end to the dancing, a portion of the royal sleeping apartments being over the ball-room. Her Majesty, accompanied by her immediate suite, then proceeded to the supper-room, which was brilliantly lit and elegantly arranged. The table, which was in the form of a prolonged oval, was covered with plate and with the viands provided. The supper was laid in the great dining-room. After remaining a short time in the supper-room her Majesty and the Prince retired to rest for the evening.

The general guests were then admitted into the supper-room, which was crowded for nearly two hours. Before two o'clock the greater part of the guests had departed.

Her Majesty's ball-dress was of rich brocaded silk, of a palish yellow colour (oiseau de Paradis). She wore the order of the Garter in diamonds. This was magnificent. On her head was a wreath of pink roses. The Prince wore his ordinary evening dress, the coat blue, with the star and collar of the Golden Fleece in diamonds. Mr. Henry Yorke wore a white gauze dress, and wreaths of alternate blue and white roses. Mrs. Grantham Yorke also wore a white gauze dress, and a head-dress of white roses. Mrs. Elliott Yorke wore a blue watered silk dress, with wreaths of roses, and trimmed with very deep Mechlin lace. She wore also a tiara of diamonds and diamond earrings and cross. Viscountess Canning was dressed in white silk, trimmed with deep lace. She wore flowers in her hair, and a magnificent necklace of diamonds.

HER MAJESTY'S RETURN TO LONDON.

Her Majesty breakfasted at 8 o'clock on Saturday morning. Prayers were read at 9 o'clock by the Hon. and Ven-

PROFESSOR WHEWELL.

We have received half-a-dozen letters* in correction of an error in the sketch appended to the portrait of Professor Whewell, in our paper of last week, who was born at Lancaster, and not at Newcastle, as stated in our notice. He was educated at the Lancaster Grammar-School, and is now about 58 years of age. When a boy, he was one day asked by a clergyman some question relative to accounts (as he made out his father's bills and calculated by decimals), when the answer given convinced the interrogator that his pupil had, from his earliest youth, known the principles of mathematics, although he had never read Euclid. The result was, that his kind friend, the clergyman, recommended a subscription, which, to the honour of the inhabitants of Lancaster, was liberally followed up, and Master Whewell was sent to a small village school in Westmoreland, which had the privilege of an exhibition to Cambridge. Of his gratitude to his patrons, Professor Whewell has given ample and honourable proof, as a public dinner given to himself and Professor Owen (another distinguished native of Lancaster), by the corporation and 200 of the principal inhabitants. Professor Whewell married lately the daughter of Mr. Marshall, of Leeds, one of the first manufacturers in the kingdom.

THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.—The last stone of the tower of this magnificent building was set by the contractor on Tuesday last, on which occasion all the workmen employed were entertained, and some bottles of champagne were drunk at the top of the scaffold in honour of the completion. All that now remains to be added to the tower will be the supports of the vane and the vane itself, which will all be of gilt copper. It is a matter of general surprise that the mass of buildings called Bank-buildings, in front of the portico, has not been cleared away, as until the removal of such obstruction no effected, no just idea of the New Royal Exchange can be formed; but judging of the proportions of the spire, its boldness, width and beauty, the committee are of opinion, that the effect of the building will be equal to that of any public edifice in Europe. We understand, however, that the purchase of these houses is completed, or nearly completed, and that they will be pulled down in the early part of next year. As soon as the removal shall have been accomplished, the space will be arranged to receive the statue of the Duke of Wellington by Sir F. Chantrey. This statue is an equestrian one in bronze, 15 feet high, and is just finished. At the east end of the Exchange the improvements of Freeman's Court are proceeding with rapidity. All the houses are pulled down, and a handsome street of ample width parallel with the new buildings will be made.

LITERATURE.

THE ILLUMINATED MAGAZINE.

To render popular a magazine at the present day is no trivial task. At the present period, when over-speculation and peculation are abundant—when the pursuits of commerce yield but a niggard gleaning—when doubts about the permanence of physical ailment persuade so many to make no sacrifice for the intellectual when the literary market is so overstocked as our manufacturers represent the commercial marts to be—when from the practice of professions no longer profitable, so many are driven on literature, as a last resort, and write invita Minerva, induced "by hunger, and request of friends,"—at such a time the determined labours of the pen are very likely to make considerable inroads on the purse, and the idealities of literary aspiration are very apt indeed to be chilled by the stern realities of finance —a book, and particularly a magazine, must, to obtain a firm foothold on the slippery acclivity which it is designed to gain, possess much intrinsic energy, and considerable attractive recommendations to induce those by whom the bold effort is first observed, to lend an aiding hand. Indeed, the announcement of a new periodical publication now-a-days excites a sensation of pity—of commiseration—for "the doomed one," who must be totally ignorant of the awful odds which are against him; or, if fears for the projector are sometimes allayed, the philosophical conclusion is, nevertheless, arrived at, that "there must be victims somewhere." However, in this unpromising state of things—when the temper of the times is anything but propitious—the magazine before us has grown and is growing, and proves its hardy nature by flourishing, unscathed by breeze or blight, like some of our mountain plants, on a soil where there seems but little aliment for it to appropriate.

We have now before us the first volume of the "Illuminated Magazine," splendidly bound, which contains a variety of sterling contributions; the productions not of men sporting for the nonce in the field of literature, and astonished at the extent of their own gambols, but of men of tried prowess—of trained, trusty, and approved exhibitors of feats of intellectual strength. There is, therefore, as might be expected, a sustainment about it—an omnipresence of shrewd observation and masculine good sense, which might hardly be expected under other circumstances. Unlike another successful publication with which the editor is said to be connected, gravity rather predominates in the mélange of articles; so much so, that we think a little addition of levity would be an improvement. However, there is a wide difference between gravity and dulness, and this book is an exemplification of the remark. The stores of history or philosophy are not here resorted to, except when the theme and the treatment of it are strikingly interesting. Indeed, gravity in the publication seems to have doffed her sable coloured garb, and to have assumed a light, smart, gay, and occasionally fantastic attire, and to be distinguishable now and then only by the frontispiece from gaiety itself. Philosophy, too, whether teaching by examples or illustrations, is here, not as she sometimes appears —an inveterate old bore, from whose dry lectures and interminable disputations all sensible people run away—but a very condescending, amiable instructor, with the greatest good humour in the world, instilling, under the guise of amusing stories, her brief and pithy truths. Altogether, the magazine has the right tone about it, and combines the stamina of a hardy constitution with the grace of attractive appearance.

Amongst the various contributions, the productions of the editor are particularly deserving of notice; and "The Folly of the Sword," "The Order of Poverty," "The Peerage of the Pen," &c., display a justness of thought and observation, as well as a degree of moral energy, creditable alike to the head and the heart. Mark Lemon's "Dogs of London" are essays, couched in a very lively style, and containing much graphic power. His "Husband's Friend" is one of the best told stories in the publication, and the bold ruse and good humour of Uncle Savory almost render the character of that "sad dog" amiable.

The same author, in selecting "The Boys of London" as subjects for his sketches, has hit upon a novel and striking theme, and one presenting an infinite variety. "The Boys of London," not including in the term the children of a larger growth, whom in the sister kingdom the designation often includes, are early initiated in the struggle for competence or subsistence, and the energy which should more seasonably add bustle to the playground, and explode in accents of merriment, is transfused into the pursuits of commerce or trade, and stimulates the zeal for profit, and sharpens the wit of the boyish bargainer. The boys of London are creatures of its men—of the all-absorbing, money-grasping enthusiasm—mayhap, necessity of the time. To describe them is, for the most part, to form a melancholy portraiture. The limner, on the present occasion, has faithfully sketched them. "The Newsboy," an admirable sketch of a numerous, for the present month presents reflections, some of which, no doubt, have often occurred to our readers; how often, even opposite to our own office, have we marked and been beguiled from ordinary labours by the hustling crowd of collected newsboys. To whom or what place could the oft-used term, "a hive of industry," be so well applied, as to the space enclosed in their busy circle? What a paroxysm of commercial zeal does it exhibit—what a fever of industry—what evident omnipresence of an afflicting money-mania—what competition as active as theirs—what eagerness so strongly developed—what desire to enlighten the ignorance of the world and distribute literature so urgent!

THE NEWSBOY.

Hark! do you hear that hum of voices? Now it swells into the tumult of riot, and the sleepy boy, whom "late we noted," with one loud hallo, rushes forward to join yonder crowd of noisy brawlers.

"As the worn warhorse at the trumpet's sound Erects his mane, and neighs and paws the ground"—

so does the Newsboy, excited by the sound of the accustomed wolde, divest his shoulders of the encumbrance of his sape, and prepare for his daily struggle for the "early quires."

If you happen to pass up Catherine-street, Strand, about five o'clock in the afternoon, you cannot but have observed a group of boys, whose presence always affords some faint idea of the confusion of tongues at the building of Babel. None but a practised ear can detect the signification of those sounds; for, by the rapidity with which they are uttered, each cry seems to be a mere jumble of words of such gigantic proportions, that one pair of lungs are unequal to its articulation. It sounds something like but it is really separate and distinct offers to barter for the Times, Chronicle, Herald, Post, or Advertiser, and will afford future philologists an excellent example of the cockney tendency to abbreviations.

How anxiously is the advent looked for, from the smoky tap-room in Wapping, to the fragrant boudoir in St. James's.

The swart artizan, from the alehouse door, strains his eyes to catch the first glimpse of the boy who brings the Morning Titter, that he may spell out the errors of his rulers, to find fresh cause to indulge his great prerogative as a true-born Briton—and grumble.

The merchant, at his cosy retreat in the suburbs of London, throws down his half-munched muffin, and pushes aside his gilded cup, at the welcome announcement of the "paper, sir." To him the news boy is as necessary as his morning meal—until he has scanned the "paper," Mercador is but as a lump of fashioned clay—the newsboy the Prometheus that vivifies it. How the rich trader's eye shines over the price of stocks, and glares down the list of bankrupts, as though it would consume the broken dealer whom ill fortune had inserted in his ledger and then consigned to the Gazette!—how his sleek face grows radiant as an illuminated dial, as he reads in Lloyd's List the return of his richly-laden corpses!

Listless Fashion feels a pulse in her heart when she hears the shrill treble of the newsboy at the door, though a few minutes suffice to gratify her anxiety about the world, for to her its limits are circumscribed. Still she desires to learn who wore the deepest lace and loftiest feathers at that great clothes-show—or drawing room at St. James's; who had deserved health and hearsomeness to fill her wasted cheeks, allured by the glitter of her worthless gauds—worthless as the beads of glass with which cupidity tempts the savage.

We have said, as yet, nothing of the many illustrations which beautify the publication—they are well executed and well designed; a feature in the literary world, of which, if we were not the developers, we were, at least, the first to awaken public attention to its beauty and utility, and one not likely in any instance to be overlooked by us. We rejoice, for the sake of literature (and with the zeal of literature is here combined), that the enjoyment which humour, and humour only, can afford, is not confined to the ephemeral publication with which the editor is said to be connected, gravity rather predominates in the mélange of articles; so much so, that we think a little addition of levity would be an improvement. However, there is a wide difference between gravity and dulness, and this book is an exemplification of the remark. THRONE IN KING'S COLLEGE CHAPEL.

ST. JOHN'S GATE.

able Henry Yorke, in the presence of her Majesty, as on the previous morning.

Her Majesty's horses had been ordered for a quarter past eleven o'clock. Very soon after that hour the royal carriages, in the same order as in the downward progress, drove out of the Park on the road towards Royston. An escort of the Whitlesea Yeomanry Cavalry, under the command of Captain Charles Smith, of the 60th Rifles, accompanied her Majesty on the way. It is only due to Captain Smith and the other officers of the Yeomanry to say, that the excellent discipline and soldier-like bearing of this body, in their attendance on her Majesty while she was in Cambridgeshire, were the subject of very general remark.

The Earl of Hardwicke, the Hon. Mr. Yorke, M.P., and several other gentlemen attended her Majesty on horseback to Royston. Her Majesty returned from thence to London by the route she came, and her return was equally marked along the line of progress by the most unbounded enthusiasm of all who assembled to do honour to their beloved sovereign.

At 4 o'clock the Royal cavalcade approached the Great Western Railway terminus, escorted by a detachment of the 13th Light Dragoon Guards. On alighting from the carriage, her Majesty and Prince Albert were received by the Lord Chamberlain and the principal officers of the Railway Company. The illustrious party were immediately conducted to the train, and in a few seconds started for Slough.

Her Majesty wore a lavender satin dress, a crimson camel's hair scarf shawl, exquisitely worked with flowers, and a Tuscan cottage bonnet with amethyst-coloured satin riband, and we rejoice to say appeared in the enjoyment of the most excellent health, and in no wise exhibiting any symptoms of fatigue from her journey. His Royal Highness Prince Albert wore a large blue military cloak with the Windsor collar, and also looked remarkably well.

The Queen and her illustrious consort, both on alighting from their carriage and on entering the train, were received with a burst of loyal and affectionate greetings, which were condescendingly acknowledged.

At ten minutes before 5 o'clock her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert arrived at Windsor Castle from the Slough station. The Queen was escorted to Windsor from Slough by a detachment of the 1st Regiment of Life Guards.

FIREWORKS IN PARKER'S PIECE.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE LANDING OF THE PRINCE OF ORANGE AT TORBAY, NOV. 5, 1688.

LANDING OF THE PRINCE OF ORANGE, NOV. 5, 1688.

The fifth of November has a two-field interest in our calendar, it being the anniversary of two of the most important events in our history—the discovery of "the gunpowder plot" in 1605, and "the revolution" in 1688. Of the latter, we here present our readers with an illustration, one of a series of tableaux of memorable events, which we have from time to time introduced into our pages, to cherish respect for these landmarks of British history.

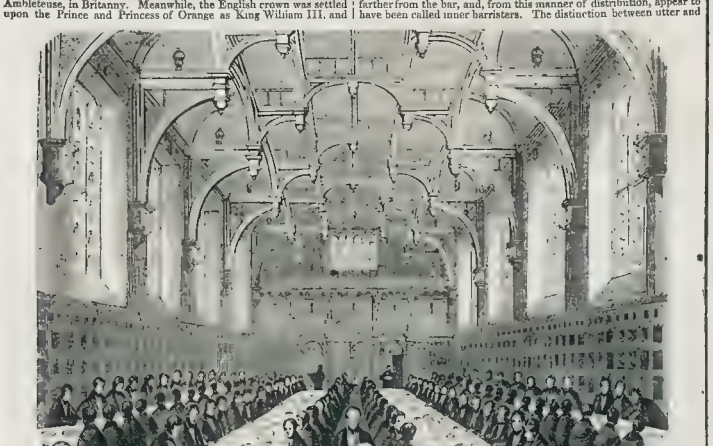
The circumstances must be briefly related. In 1688, the disgraceful acts of James II having placed the country in a position of great difficulty, the heads of the several parties in the state joined in an appeal to James's son-in-law, William, Prince of Orange, for his assistance to save the public liberties, and he, at last, made up his mind to comply with their solicitations; and having arranged his preparations with consummate skill, he sailed from Holland with an army of about 14,000 men, composed partly of Dutch troops and partly of English regiments in the service of the States, and landed at Torbay, on the coast of Devonshire, on Nov. 5, 1688. On the 9th he made a public entry into Exeter, where he remained for some days before any of the principal people of the country joined him; on the 21st he quitted Exeter on his march to London. Before the end of the month, James found himself deserted by everybody: all were gone over to the Prince—the people, the gentry, the nobility, the army, his immediate servants and friends, even his children. On December 18, the Prince, having arrived with his army in London, desired James to leave the palace at Whitehall, on which he proceeded to Rochester, and on the 23rd embarked from that port on board a frigate, in which he was conveyed to Ambleteuse, in Britanny. Meanwhile, the English crown was settled upon the Prince and Princess of Orange as King William III. and Queen Mary. Thus, with unparalleled ease and rapidity, was that unenviable and bloodless revolution effected, which changed the royal line, and firmly established the constitution of these realms.

It is related that when the news of the landing of the Prince of Orange was brought to James, he was sitting to Sir Godfrey Kneller for a portrait designed as a present to Samuel Pepys, his faithful Secretary to the Admiralty. The King commanded the painter to proceed, and finish the portrait, that his friend might not be disappointed.

DINING IN THE MIDDLE TEMPLE HALL.

In another part of our paper will be found an illustration of the formal commencement of November Term. We here present our readers with a companion engraving of the mode of keeping the term in one of our inns of court—in short, the first dinner of the term.

In "good old times," legal education and hospitality went hand in hand. Hence, the halls of our different inns of court have, for several centuries, composed a kind of university for the education of advocates, subject to this arrangement. The benchers and readers, being the superiors of each house, occupied, on public occasions of ceremony, the upper end of the hall, which was raised on a dais, and separated from the rest of the building by a bar. The next in degree were the utter barristers, who, after they had attained a certain standing, were called from the body of the hall to the bar (that is, to the first place outside the bar), for the purpose of taking a principal part in the mootings or exercises of the house; and hence they probably derived the name of utter or outer barristers. The other members of the inn, consisting of students of the law under the degree of utter barristers, took their places nearer to the centre of the hall, and farther from the bar, and, from this manner of distribution, appear to have been called inner barristers. The distinction between utter and inner barristers is, at the present day, wholly abolished; the former being called barristers generally, and the latter falling under the denomination of students.



TERM DINNER IN THE MIDDLE TEMPLE HALL.

The public "moots," exercises, and duties, have long been dispensed with; and the general rule, as to qualification, in all the inns of court, is, that a person, in order to entitle himself to be called to the bar, must be twenty-one years of age, have kept twelve terms, and have been for five, or three years, at least, a member of the society. The keeping of terms includes dining a certain number of times in the hall, and hence the pleasantry of eating the way to the bar; the preparatory studies being now private. Of the great business of refection, the engraving shows the most dignified scene—the Benchers' Dinner—the benchers, or "antients," as they were formerly called, being the governors of the inn, at the Temple called the Parliament. The Middle Temple hall, the scene of the engraving, greatly surpasses the halls of the other societies in size and splendour. It was begun in 1562, and finished about ten years afterwards; it is 100 feet long, 40 feet wide, and upwards of 60 feet in height. The roof and panels are finely decorated, and the screen at the lower end is beautifully carved. There are a few good pictures: amongst others, one of Charles I. on horseback, by Vandyke; also, portraits of Charles II., Queen Anne, George I., and George II.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

THE SISTERS.

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE

By HENRY COCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "VALENTINE VOX," "STANLEY THORN," ETC.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE RIVERS.

CAROLINE was now indeed wretched. She felt as if alone in the world—shut out from all society—suspected and contemned. Where were her friends? Who were they? She did not then believe that she had one. All seemed, in her view, to be arrayed against her. Whom could she consult? In whom could she confide? Her father? She had never been taught to solicit his advice: she had never had reason to rely upon his judgment. He was not a man to be, even by his children, revered: he never had commanded the slightest veneration. His stubborn adherence to that absurd principle of predestination had rendered him an object of mirth; and it is as impossible to revere those at whom we have been in the habit of laughing, as it is to acquire the habit of laughing at those whom we really revere. Still, circumstances, as she was then, having no one else to whom she could, or rather would, apply, she, after having dwelt upon her fallen, pourtrid self until she had become almost mad, joined him in the library, in which he usually sat throughout the morning, making history subservient to his peculiar views, and regarding every incident as a striking illustration of the beauty of that principle by which he was guided.

"Well, my girl," said he, as she entered, "do you feel more tranquil?"

"Father," said Caroline, "what's to be done?"

"What's to be done?" returned Greville. "That it's impossible for us to tell. We know what has been done; but what is to be done we know nothing about, being utterly unable to dive into futurity."

"Father, I am anxious to have your advice."

"My dear," replied Greville, "I am no prophet. If I were, my advice would be of infinite value; but it must of necessity be valueless, seeing that I am not. They who give advice are presumptuous indeed: it being impossible for them to tell either what particular course will be pursued, or to what the pursuit of any particular course will tend."

"Is it impossible, father," said Caroline, earnestly, "for you to speak like a rational man?"

"A rational man, my dear! Well! there's no accounting for these things certainly, but do I not speak like a rational man?"

"You do not, indeed. I am anxious to have your advice!"

"Would you have me fly in the face of Providence?"

"Preposterous folly, father! I've no patience with you!"

"I perceive it, my dear: I see clearly that you have no patience."

"Will you advise me how to act?"

"If you cannot listen to me calmly, my dear, why, of course, there's no help for it; but if you could I would explain to you clearly that I cannot do that which you desire me to do, without being in the highest degree presumptuous. To pretend to advise is to pretend to a species of divination, which, until we are able to foretel events, never can be justified. For instance, you ask my advice, and I am sufficiently presumptuous to give you my advice. I advise you how to act—I advise you to adopt a certain course, at the same time expressing my conviction of its being not only the course you ought to pursue, but the one most likely to result in the attainment of the object proposed. Now, how absurd is this!—how utterly absurd. How can I tell what course you will have to pursue? How is it possible for me to tell—if even you are to adopt the very course which I presume to advise—that its pursuit will lead to the object in view? It is perfectly amazing to me that men will have so much presumption, when every event has been irrevocably ordered."

"How can you presume to know, father, that every event has been irrevocably ordered?"

"It is a matter of belief, my dear, not of absolute knowledge!"

"I believe that one thing has been irrevocably ordered, and that is that you will never be cured of this folly. Here am I left completely destitute, without a single friend in the world, soliciting the advice of my own father, who refuses to give it."

"Upon principle, my dear!—upon principle alone—in the perfect conviction of all advice being in reality and absolutely valueless. I know how some would advise you to act—I well know that they would advise you to be tranquil, and endeavour to assure you that if you be tranquil and resign by reliance make enemies of those who are anxious to become your friends, all will yet be well. But, I, being fully convinced that unless you are to be tranquil you cannot be tranquil—"

"Father! No more of this. I can be calm when I please to be calm, and violent—"

"Ah!" exclaimed Greville, shaking his head with great significance, "there's the grand error."

Caroline was now about to give free vent to the expression of the feelings he had thus awakened; but as the servant at the moment announced Charles and Lucrece, she paused her folding doors, as they entered the library, conceiving herself then to be friendless indeed.

"Where is Caroline?" enquired Lucrece, "we heard that she was here!"

"She was here just now," replied Greville, and he pointed to the folding doors as he spoke with an intensely mysterious expression.

"I must see her," said Lucrece, as she opened the door, "I have something of importance to communicate. Caroline, she added, on entering the room softly, "may I come in, dear?"

"You perceive," replied Caroline principle had its subdued and broken voice.

"My sister, dear sister!" exclaimed Lucrece, on perceiving that she was in tears, "you will, dear Caroline, hear me now! I feel that you will."

"Now that I am utterly friendless now, you feel that I will hear you now."

"I am one, you are not friendless. I am your friend. I ever will be your friend, indeed indeed I will. While you are wretched, I must be wretched too. But there is happiness in store for you yet."

"Happiness! No, Lucrece, happiness is yours: you will be happy; but I can never taste happiness again."

Lucrece burst into tears. Caroline knew not why; but the bitterness with which she wept melted her heart, and she became like a sister again.

"Why do you thus weep, Lucrece?" she enquired, "is it for me? Are these tears induced by the conviction that I am guilty of the odious crime of which I have been accused? I am innocent, indeed, I am innocent!" she cried, as Lucrece wept still more convulsively. "you will believe me, Lucrece?"

"I do, I do!" exclaimed Lucrece, as she fell upon Caroline's neck in agony.

"Then, why are these tears so bitterly shed? If I were the guilty creature supposed—"

"Caroline, you torture me! my heart will break, I cannot endure it! In mercy say no more."

A pause ensued: a pause during which, although amazed, Caroline caressed Lucrece tenderly, and wiped away the tears which continued to flow, she felt as her former affection returned, while Lucrece struggled hard to repress her emotion.

"Do you feel better, dear," she enquired at length.

With a smile so sad that it seemed to mock itself, Lucrece looked up and passionately kissed her.

"I am so happy!" she exclaimed, in tones which went direct to Caroline's heart, "so happy now that you are my dear, dear sister again!"

"I have been unkind," returned Caroline, "I know that I have been most unkind, but consider, Lucrece, what my feelings must have been when I found myself struck from the high position I had occupied, and with a tarnished reputation rendered friendless and poor. I was mad! I scarcely knew what I said. I looked upon you all as my enemies. I felt that I had but one friend in the world, and him I have since seen proved to be a villain."

"Thank Heaven!" cried Lucrece, with startling energy, "you have proved this? I knew it would—I knew it must—I have said that you would, but he feared that the proof would not come—"

"It has come, alas! too late as it is."

"Better late than, at least, it is in time. Have you proved it beyond all doubt."

"I have Lucrece, indeed."

"I rejoice at it, Charles will rejoice too; all will rejoice."

"Lucrece!" cried Caroline, starting.

"For your sake, dear! for your sake they will rejoice."

"Lucrece, they must not know of it. I am prostrate now, heaven knows, but if you love me—and I think Lucrece you do—you will not cause me to be trampled upon."

"Who, who will trample upon you? Who will triumph over you? Caroline, I perceive you imagine that Charles would! Oh! do not believe him to be your enemy. He would not injure you for worlds. I know that he would not. He has too kind, too pure a heart. He will protect you: he will look upon you, dear, as a sister. Let me assure you that he is worthy of your highest esteem."

"Still, Lucrece, this must not be known. I will explain all to you anon; but it must be explained to you only. I therefore confide in you, Lucrece. I may do so with safety."

"You may, but as you may confide with equal safety in Charles, let me tell him—him alone—do dear, let me tell him!"

"No, Lucrece: at least not at present. Let it be known only to ourselves. Although your husband, you can keep a secret even from him—can you not?"

Lucrece on the instant started, and, looking with a doubtful expression at her sister, became pale as death.

"What is the matter?" demanded Caroline, "what have I said? Lucrece," she exclaimed, "you sit—thank me guilty?"

"No, no, indeed," replied Lucrece, "I do not, I do not, believe me. But," she added, after a pause, "for your own sake, dear, let me name this to Charles."

"Pray for my own sake, Lucrece!"

"Recas se requires but the knowledge of this to render you happy and affluent again."

"It is possible."

"Here is a document which alone, dear, secures an independence. But I will not give it you now: I do not think it sufficient, nor does Charles: he is anxious to divide the estate with you."

"Base have I deeply wronged him."

"You have, dear Caroline, if you ever supposed him to be unkind, for he is, believe me, the kindest soul that ever lived. But you did not know this: you were ignorant of the noble generosity of his nature, and hence you believed him capable of an act of injustice. He will not, however, dwell upon this now. Come, let us return to the library: he will be so glad to see you."

"I cannot, Lucrece—indeed, I cannot see him now—some other time."

"Oh, folly! He will be more pleased to see you than ever."

"More pleased to see in the more unworthy!"

Again Lucrece wept, and Caroline wept with her, in the perfect conviction that her highly reprehensible conduct alone had caused her sorrow to flow afresh.

"But," said Lucrece, having somewhat rallied; "this will never do. Come, dry your eyes, dear," she added, kissing her. "I must not now suffer a tear to be seen."

"Lucrece: my sister!" cried Caroline, as they embraced each other fondly. "Hearts, Lucrece, are wounded most by kindness undeserved. Had you and Charles been strictly just, my stubborn pride would not have yielded. I then should have looked at the severity of my punishment alone. But now I feel my spirit humbled. Love and generosity, thus unmerited, turn my thoughts within myself, and—shall I add, which—being, as I am, dispossessed of the power to make atonement—cannot be healed by even penitence and tears."

Lucrece now made every effort to console her, and, what she had succeeded, by gentle reason, in restoring her to comparative tranquility, she bade her adieu; but, having reached the door, with the view of leaving, she returned, and, in silence, while kissing her with the utmost affection, "Caroline! my sister! you shall be happy yet."

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The Sealark, 10 guns, was commissioned on Monday last at Portsmouth, by Commander Thomas L. Gooch (1840).

Captain Wauch, who has succeeded Lord John Hay in command of the Warspite, was second lieutenant of the Shannon, when she captured the Chesapeake, American frigate. Captain Brove, of the Shannon, was severely wounded in the action, and the first lieutenant was killed, and therefore the duty of taking both ships into harbour devolved upon Captain Wauch.

APPOINTMENTS.—Commanders: Sir Cornwallis Ricketts, Bart., to the Helena; Robert Wilson (thirty years as, ing-master of the late Duke of Buckingham's yacht), to the Vernon. Lieutenants: H. King and E. Holmes (additional), to the Winchester; H. Charleton and L. Pritchard (additional), to the Illustrious. George Mervyn, to the Fox, Byron Drury, to the Skirmisher; R. M. Gordon, to the Vernon; J. Ruthin, to the St. Vincent, vice Douglas Reid, to the hospital; John Mc. D. Smith and Brook Young, to the Helena. G. L. Norcock, of the Warspite, to the St. Vincent, vice Reid, to the Warspite. Mr. Coxwell, boatswain; H. T. Veitch, to the Excellent; R. I. G. Macdonald and J. S. Shore, to the Asfred; Robert Coote, to the Cornwallis. Surgeons: Charles Maclay, to the Fox, vice Wilson, to the Helena; Jas. W. H. B. Jones, to be surgeon-superintendent of the Marion convict ship. Assistant-surgeons: W. Henderson, to the Hazard; W. Hall, to the Excellent; W. T. Gunning, to the Excellent. H. B. Everest, to the Devastation; Thomas Davies, to the Fisgard.

NAVAL COURT-MARTIAL.—A naval court-martial assembled on board the Caledonia on Friday last, to try Lieut enant Morris, of the Tweed, on charges preferred by Lieut. Ellinas, senior lieutenant of the same ship, for having on September the 22d, attempted to depose Lieut. Ellinas's authority as senior lieutenant, by applying to him the expression of "you fool, or a —— fool (Lieut. Ellinas having punished a seaman of the Tweed for neglect of duty). The following officers composed the Court:—Sir Samuel Pym, president; Captains Burgoyne, the Hon. W. F. Grey, Frederick Bruce, and Alexander Milne. The Court were of opinion that the charge had been in part proved, but in consideration of circumstances which had appeared in evidence, the Court did only adjudge the said Lieutenant Morris to be reprimanded.—On Monday the Court, composed by the same officers, re-assembled to try Mr. G. F. Tuke, volunteer first class of the Tweed, on the prosecution of lieutenant Ellinas, for —— in council, and for deserting from the ship on the night of the 25th of September. The Court were of opinion that the charges had been in part proved, and in consequence adjudged the prisoner to lose six months' time of service as volunteer of the first class.—The Court next proceeded to try Mr. Henry James Grant, mate of the Tweed, on a charge preferred by Lieutenant Ellinas, of insubordinate conduct. The Court were of opinion that the charge had in part been proved, and did adjudge the prisoner to be reprimanded.—Commander Thomas Graves, president of the Court, in the room of Captain Milne, who was prosecutor in the next case, which was a charge against Mr. Maitland, second master of the Caledonia, having been absent from his ship without leave on the 16th of August, and for having on the 19th of the same month, absented himself from the ship without leave of the commanding officer. The Court were of opinion that the charges had been proved, and fot adjudge the prisoner to be dismissed the service.

DEATH OF GENERAL THE HON. EDWARD FINCH.—We have to record the demise of the Hon. Edward Finch, fourth son of the late Earl of Aylesford, and uncle of the present peer, whose dissolution took place on Friday week. The deceased, who was born the 26th of April, 1758, entered the army as cornet in 1775. He served in Flanders, and in 1795 commanded the 1st Battalion of the Coldstream Guards in the expedition to the Helder, and in Egypt he rendered part colar service in the command of a brigade of cavalry, and afterwards of infantry. In 1807 he accompanied the expedition to Copenhagen under Lord Cathcart, and there ably distinguished himself. The colonelcy of the 22d (the Cheshire) Regiment becomes vacant, of which corps he had been the senior field officer since the 18th of September, 1809

ESTABLISHMENT OF OUR-PENSIONERS.—The following officers have been appointed to Invalid:—Captain Reige, 36th; Captain Brown, 41st, Captain Donelan, 49th; Captain Boyle, 66th; Captains Carlan, Beasley, Calder, Wards, and Phipps, half-pay; Lieutenant Furlong, half pay; Lieutenant Meredith, half-pay, 16th Foot; Lieutenant Cleland, half-pay, 42d Foot.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

HOCHHEAD, Oct. 7.—The Marquis Wellington, bound to Newry, is on shore in the bay, a total wreck; crew saved. The Lady, from Liverpool to Swansea, is on shore in Carnarvon Bay; but is likely to be got off.

FLEETWOOD, Oct. 28.—The Aristocrat, from Montreal to Liverpool, was driven on shore off Blackpool this morning. She is expected to go to pieces, two passengers drowned, two of the crew saved, the remainder on board the ship; to which a steamer would be sent from Fleetwood as soon as possible.

CARDIGAN, Oct. 28.—The Hampton, Rowland, from Liverpool to Marseilles, was stranded this day to-day, and must be discharged in order to get off. Another vessel is on her, and it is feared will become a wreck. A sloop has sunk in the bay, three men are in the rigging, but the sea is too high for assistance to be of use. A piece of wreck has come ashore here, but nothing to indicate to what vessel it belongs. The Bristol Trader is totally wrecked; crew drowned, and part of cargo washed ashore. The Lord of the Isles, from Jersey to Whitehaven, is on shore; crew saved. Another schooner has just gone ashore to the bar.

SOUTHWOLD, Oct. 28.—The Sally, Willham, from Goole to Harwich, was driven on shore near here last night; master drowned, crew saved. The Ann, Cooper, from London to the port yesterday, received damage, but proceeded this morning.

RAMSGATE, Oct. 28.—The Alma, Scarn, from London to Sicily, in attempting the harbour this morning, drove on the beach to the eastward. The Speighty, Harnett, from Shields to Jersey, was totally lost this morning on Margate Sands: crew saved.—Oct. 29. The Maxine, Le Gal, from Rochefort to Bordeaux, struck on the Goodwin Sands, on the Long Sand, crew saved.

WALES FERRY.—Four of the Dundee whalers have arrived at that port during the week—the Horn and the Alexander on Tuesday, and the Advice and the Princess Charlotte on Wednesday last. They are all small vessels, the Horn being but sixty-eight tons, about 53 tuns; the Alexander thirteen fish, 86 tuns; the Advice seven fish, 80 tuns, and the Princess Charlotte six fish, 66 tuns. These vessels left the ice on the 28th September, and had fair passages home. The Alexander, we learn, has a full cargo of sperm oil, and has been seen by the other vessels for several days before leaving the coast.

The Sarah Bell, belonging to Mr. Coat of Brighton, was brought into harbour, with the loss of job and stowaway. The master of the Sarah Bell reports, that on Saturday morning a schooner, evidently disabled by the gale, was near them, with a signal of distress flying, and that about nine o'clock, when about seven miles off Littlehampton, he suddenly missed her. There is no doubt that the vessel went to the bottom, and that the whole of the crew were lost. The Princess Royal fell in with the fragments of a brig off the Littlehampton coast, and towed some of the spars into harbour.

CARDIGAN, Oct. 30.—Two of the smacks driven ashore near here, which were in the rigging yesterday, are all drowned. The Packet of this port is totally lost with all hands; cargo washing ashore. The Mary of Newquay is a total loss; crew drowned. A brig belonging to Oakley remains on the bar, crew saved.

HEATHWAITE, Oct. 29.—It blew a hurricane yesterday at N.W. A schooner, in making the harbour this night, struck on the Carrick, and was expected to be drowned.

BROADSTAIRS, Oct. 30.—The Sprightly, from Shields to Jersey, is sunk near Margate Sand: crew saved

LOSS OF THE AFRICAN.—By the arrival of the Acadia steam-ship, intelligence has been received at Lloyd's, announcing the loss of the British-built barque Africane, Commander Captain Rudkin, on the night of the 27th ult. off Cape St. Lawrence, on the last passage from North Shields to Quebec. The particulars of her destruction are of a very painful character, two of her crew having been lost in attempting to save themselves, while the remainder being preserved, after enduring the most dreadful sufferings from the want of food and exposure to the weather in a wild barren country. The captain and crew have returned to England.

EMIGRATION TO AMERICA.—On Sunday the American line of packet ship Montreal Captain Tinkey, sailed from the St. Katharine's Dock for New York. She carries out about seventy emigrants, who indulge the hope of bettering their condition in the "far west." She takes out an excellent cargo of woollens from Leeds and Bradford, and a considerable amount of transactions with Jonathan are evidently on the increase.

Off the coast of Suffolk, the vessels which were lost or damaged during the storm, have been ascertained to be the Eleanor, the Mentum, the Neleus, and a large black schooner. Upwards of 30 individuals are supposed to have perished with them. Out of all the crews only one was saved—he was taken on a piece of wreck with another unfortunate seaman, who expired almost immediately on his landing. At Dunbar a valuable schooner, named the Brains, arrived in London for £2,600, was lost about three miles to the eastward of the Harbour. The crew saved themselves by taking to the boats. She was from Bordeaux, laden with wine, part of which is expected to be saved. The Welsh coast was the scene of heavy disasters: near Pwllheli three vessels were wrecked, but their names, as yet, have not been learned. At Whitby, one vessel was lost—the Sarah, of Yarmouth. At Aberdeen a fine brig was lost, called the Margaret. Near Beaumaris, a vessel was seen to go down off the entrance of the harbour, with all hands, and a short distance from Liverpool, the brig Nelly, of Harrington, supposed to be from Whitehaven for Dublin, sunk off Burnshead, and every one on board with her, reported to be nine persons. Most of the principal headlands are crowded with shipping, repairing the vast number of injuries which they received whilst weathering the storm.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

The Rev. J. Coker has been collated by the Lord Bishop of Lincoln to the prebend of Stealord, in the cathedral church of Lincoln.

The Vicar of Audley has presented the Rev. R. C. Moore to the perpetual curacy of Talk-o'-th'-Hill, Staffordshire, value £215 per annum.

R. B. Sheridan, Esq., has presented the Rev. W. Lee, late of Exeter College, to the rectory of Bettiscomb, Dorset, value £180 per annum.

The Rector of Chorley, Lancashire, has presented the Rev. W. S. Strong to the perpetual curacy of St. Gilcs's, in that city.

The Trustees of Sir C. Corbet have presented the Rev. W. Taylor, of Trinity College, to the perpetual curacy of Child's Ercall, Salop, value £56 per annum.

The Lord Bishop of Norwich has collated the Rev. Richard Bentley Person Kidd to the vicarage of Potter Heigham, in his lordship's gift.

OXFORD.—Dr. Bellamy, of St. John's College, having withdrawn as a candidate for the Professorship of Common Law, Dr. Kenyon, of All Souls College, is the only remaining one. It is understood that the emoluments of this office are about £200 per annum, and that no lectures have been delivered for many years. The election will be on Tuesday, November 7. The new library at Queen's College is now finished; It is connected with the old library by a light and elegant spiral iron staircase. The new library has been built for the reception of the magnificent bequest of Dr. Mason, formerly Fellow of that Society, of 30,000 volumes. Sir Francis H. Doyle, Bart., Fellow of All Souls College, was on Thursday admitted to the degree of bachelor in civil law. J. R. Nicholls, of Oriel College, has been elected a fellow on the Michel foundation of Queen's College. In a Convocation holden on Monday, the nomination of the Rev. P. C. Claughton, M.A., Fellow of University College, to be a Public Examiner, in Literæ Humaniores, was unanimously agreed to. In the same Convocation, the Rev. William Hunter, M.A., Fellow of St. John's, was unanimously elected to the Lecturership of St. Giles's, in this city.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—B.A. Examination, 1843.—Examination for Honours.—The names are arranged in the order of proficiency. Mathematics and Natural Philosophy:—George Jessel, scholarship, University College; William Ridout Wills, University College. Classics—Bunnell Lewis, scholarship, University College; Joseph Ash Baynes, Stepney College. Vegetable Physiology and Structural Botany—George Jessel, prize of books, University College; Albert Mott, University College.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

By a late Parliamentary return of the total numbers of copies of wills and exhibits of administrations sent to the Legacy Duty Office in each of the years 1839, 1840, and 1841, it appears that in the first year there were 22,160, the second 22,106, and in 1841 the number was 23,068. There were 16,701 wills in the last-mentioned year

On Sunday morning last the Temple church, which has been closed since August last, for the purpose of additional alterations, was re-opened for divine service.

The Bishop of Lincoln, in the tour which he has just completed, confirmed 13,000 persons, being about 1000 more than were admitted to that sacred rite during his Lordship's last diocesan circuit.

The building materials of the Worksop Manor House were sold on Tuesday last, by direction of his Grace the Duke of Newcastle, for 20,000 guineas. It is said the original cost of the mansion was upwards of £200,000.

A Baptist clergyman and his wife, who reside in the vicinity of Boston, have the pleasure of daily gathering round their fireside four daughters, two of whom were born in four different quarters of the globe, viz., one in Europe, one in Asia, one in Africa, and one in America—a fact probably unparalleled in the history of any other family in New England.

Eight carriages of no sparings have within these few days been brought into service in conveying the fish from Dieppe to Paris, availing themselves of the railroad from Rouen They are called Couriers de la Marée.

About 2500 boxes of American cheese were offered at public sale at Liverpool last week, of which fully 1600 sold, chiefly from 40s. to 52s. 6d. per cwt., The trade in this article at this port is becoming one of very considerable importance, and we are glad to find that the merchants are paying more attention to the make, so as to adapt it better to the English taste. The Chatsworth bridge, which arrived on Friday, brought upwards of 3900 packages, and a further supply of upwards of 2000 is expected from the Liverpool packets from New York

A rumour, having its origin in Roman Catholic circles in Dublin, is in circulation, to the effect that Bishop Riggins of Ardagh, has been summoned to Rome to answer charges preferred against him by certain parties sent by him in reference to England at one of the earliest of the monster Repeal meetings.

We learn from Wisbaden, Oct. 16, that the Duke de Nassau escaped assassination before, Sunday last. He was himself steering in the boat from Rudesheim to Bingen, when the wind rose and upset it. The Prince was in the water, when some boatmen succeeded in saving him.

An order in council, recently issued, directs that the six minor canons of Westminster Abbey shall each in future receive an annual stipend of £150.

We regret to state that Captain Bernal, M.P. for Wycombe, met with a serious accident last Friday, whilst hunting with Sir William Stanley's hounds. The gallant Captain received a kick from a horse just above the ankle, which unfortunately broke the splinter bone of his leg.

There are now in the city of Dublin upwards of one thousand ladies, and, awful to relate, only seventeen gentlemen to be divided amongst them.

At the close of last week, the managing clerk of a mercantile establishment in Glasgow was arrested on a charge of forging bankers' drafts for upwards of £2000. He has since been committed for trial.

In the Canadian House of Assembly, Mr. Baldwin has given notice of his intention to move for an address to Parliament for the purpose of declaring Orange and all other secret societies illegal.

We have to record the occurrence of an immense conflagration that happened lately broke out in the city of Pesth, on the 2nd inst. at about nine o'clock, and was not got under until 60 houses had been destroyed, together with numerous outbuildings, in the vicinity of the New Market place. Five hundred hundred families are left without a roof to shelter them, their property also consumed. We have not heard any cause assigned for the breaking out of this disastrous fire.

The City Bridewell House of Correction is now so unusually full that there is not room for the admission of another prisoner. The immediate cause of this seeming increase of the smaller offences in the City arises from the influx of paupers, who prefer committing criminal offences and being sent to gaol rather than go to a union workhouse.

The insurance offices have increased the rate of premiums on mill property from 10s. to 15s. per sent. In consequence of this increase the mill owners entered a deputation to form an association for mutual insurance.

About 300 men are employed night and day on the slip between the viaduct and the bridge over the Canterbury-road, on the South Eastern Railway We are afraid that this unfortunate place will suffer the opening next month. Another month or six weeks' time will complete the viaduct; and the permanent station is almost ready for the reception of the trains.

Several of the German Princes have imitated the example of Father Mathew in propagating temperance societies, but the means which they are employing for this purpose are of a curious description. The King of Bavaria has just published a decree, by which he forms an association for the purpose of becomes the members and heads of a new temperance society, and at the same time they are called upon to engage their fellow citizens to the same

The yellow fever is raging with fearful virulence in some of the southern states of America. In New Orleans it is particularly virulent, and the mortality is considerable. The same remark applies to Mobile, and strangers, who are not acclimated, are visited with a most distressing disease.

The King of Hanover has made a concession to German navigation, in abolishing the tolls and duties for navigating the river Ems. This is particularly important to the towns of Leer, Papenburg, Rhine and Ems by a canal, and thus delivering German trade from the necessity of having its outlet to the sea by the Dutch ports.

The plan intended for the taxing masters of the Court of Chancery, appointed under the late "new rules," is now completed. The exterior of the building, which is of the purest style of architecture, is exceedingly neat and well-proportioned. The principal entrance, immediately opposite of the southern side of Staple's Inn, abutting upon Southampton-buildings, and were opened for the transaction of public business on Thursday last.

There landed and embarked during the summer, at the Red House-pier, Battersea-fields, 1,237,000 persons, being an average of 9,000 per week.

The late regulation about the Jews entering the Russian army has its redeeming qualities. It is not rare in Russia that persons from the ranks obtain commissions, which gives them nobility, constituting letters of nobility. Jews, however, were not hitherto entitled to that distinction either in Russia or Poland.

The Commissioners of Customs have appointed J. Benyon, Esq., of the Customs, Outdoor Office, to be Surveyor of the Port of Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 8½d to 9d; of household ditto, 7d to 8d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 50s 5d; barley, 30s 9d; oats, 17s 8d; rye, 30s 3d; beans, 31s 1d; peas, 32s 1d.

Tea.—Since the sales have concluded, the demand for all kinds of tea has ruled inactive at late rates. The stock in warehouse is now 29,909,347 lbs., against 28,862,011 lbs. at the corresponding period in 1842.

Sugar.—There has been a very limited inquiry for all kinds of sugar this week, and the quotations may be considered somewhat easier

Coffee.—The market is still inactive, but prices have undergone no material alteration.

Rice.—Very little is doing in rice, either publicly or privately, and purchases can be effected on exactly terms.

Oils.—This market is very flat—linseed oil having fallen to 30s. per cwt. The value of other kinds of oil is about stationary

Cinnamon.—The quarterly sales save gone off well, on rather higher terms.

Provisions.—Both Irish and foreign butter is selling slowly, at barely the late depression. The bacon market is firm, but in other kinds of provisions we have scarcely any sales to report

Tallow.—The demand is very limited, 41s 6d to 41s 9d is the quotation for fine T.C. on the spot.

Hops.—Although we have a very large quantity of most kinds of hops on sale, the demand continues steady, at unproved quotations. The duty is called at £239,000. Cattle.—Aldar's, 1Ds; Stewart's, 21s 2d; Lambton's, 21s; Hetton's, 21s 3d per ton. Ships arrived 56.

Smithfield.—Our market to day was very scantily supplied with beasts, yet the demand for them was again excessively heavy, and Monday's prices were not supported. The number of sheep was exceedingly small, but so inactive was the mutton trade, that nearly one half of them were turned out unsold. In prime we have no alteration to notice. Calves were in good supply and depressed inquiry, at an abatement of quite 2d per 8lbs. The pork trade ruled dull at late rates. No bacon on stock or offer. Mid to prime Scots, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; ditto each. Per 8lbs, to suit the offal.—Coarse inferior beasts, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; second quality ditto, 2s 10d to 3s; prime large oxen, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 6d to 3s 8d; large coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 8d to 3s; second quality ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime South Down ditto, 4s to 4s 2d; large coarse calves, 3s to 3s 4d; prime small ditto, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; large hogs, 3s to 3s 6d; sucking calves, 3s 6d to 3s 10d. Newgate and Leadenhall.—We had a very heavy trade here to-day, on the following terms:—Per 8lbs. by the carcass.—Inferior beef, 2s 6d to 3s 6d; middling ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime large ditto, 3s 8d to 3s; ditto small ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; large pork, 2s 6d to 3s 4d; inferior mutton, 2s 8d to 3s, middling ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d, prime ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; small pork, 3s 8d to 3s 10d.

COMMERCE AND MONEY

The more favourable state of the home markets, added to the large orders now in execution for our colonies, and for foreign possessions, has given additional activity to our general manufactures of all sorts of goods, amongst which we are happy to include cutlery and hard wares of all descriptions. The disappearance of distress in all the mining districts is also the consequence of this improved state of things, and we have no doubt disappear that degree of discontent which has now for several months existed amongst the mining population. The abundance of employment which has been given to the shipping interest and coasting trade is naturally increasing the demand for money, and even in a small degree enhancing the annual rates of interest to be secured from it by the discount of commercial paper and banker's acceptances, although the income to be obtained from capital employed in this channel is still far from being so good as could be desired.

The balance of our foreign trade continuing to be very considerably in our favour, the precious metals are naturally remitted to this country in payment of this balance, and thus a money accumulating in the hands of the monied capitalists, and the difficulties in the way of its profitable employment are certainly not much removed by the additional quantity of it now required for agricultural purposes. That state of the money market has now for several weeks been operating rather favourably on the value of the shares in various descriptions of joint stock associations, more particularly in those of the leading railway companies, for which, during the week, there has created an increased demand, and higher prices have in many instances been obtained. Large sums of money continue to be employed in the completion of some of these railways, and in the commencement of new operations of the same description; and thus is money placed, for a season, in circulation amongst the productive classes of society. But still the capital now in joint stock company cannot find full employment in this channel alone, eighty millions sterling being already invested in it: and it is becoming weekly more manifest that the public credit of the United Kingdom should be called on to more extensively than it has ever yet been, for the supply of capital to the cultivation of many millions of acres of waste land, now useless to the inhabitants of this country.

On the Foreign Stock Exchange a foreign demand for various descriptions of national securities still causes considerable activity amongst the brokers and dealers in that great mart of speculation. In Spanish Three per cents a decrease of 1 per cent. occurred in the course of the week. In Peruvian Bonds an improvement to the same extent must likewise be noted. Dutch Stock is also in demand, and rather dearer, no interest are flowing in from the Austrian Bonds.

In the beginning of the week not much activity was observable on the English Stock Exchange, but towards the middle of it, purchases to a considerable extent were effected, and they were naturally attended by an advance in the value of all descriptions of English public securities.

At the conclusion of the week's transactions in the money market, the activity observable on Thursday last continued, and the continuance of money operations to an extent to keep this stock exchange in a particular produced a farther improvement in the value of the Consols, in which more business was done for the account of 30th inst. and the 2nd of December next expect that, after the payment of the next half-yearly dividend is deducted the price will be nearer 96 than 95. On the foreign stock exchange, also, the abundance of money continued, till the end of the week, favourable to the influence the prices of various descriptions of foreign securities remained in a most satisfactory state when our present number went to press.

THE GRAVE OF GENIUS.
A Tale: true, yet marvellous. By J. O. LA MONT.
"A picture of the struggles of a neglected genius in London. Told in touching and beautiful language. Nor is it devoid of keen and biting satire. The work is well worthy perusal; and we recommend it to the attention of our readers. Though unpretending, its style is refined, and its language correct; and as the incidents are numerous, the reader has been written by Crabbe, without detracting from his reputation."—The Dublin Warder.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL.—The Committee, in requesting the AID of the BENEVOLENT for this Hospital, beg to state that there are annually admitted, for the relief, which they afford, 4,000 poor afflicted persons; and that it has altogether rendered assistance to upwards of 85,000 destitute objects, the greater part of whom were sufferers under severe diseases or painful accidents. Notwithstanding the utmost economy and care in their expenditure, the income of the charity, without the casual assistance of the affluent, would be far too limited to admit of so useful an exercise of its operations as could be desired, and the Committee, therefore, beg to state that Donations and Annual Subscriptions are most thankfully received by the Rev. G. H. Rowers, the Treasurer, No. 7, Sise-lane, Bucklersbury; and by the Committee, Secretary, and Clerk, at the Hospital; and by Messrs. Drummond, Messrs. Coutts, Messrs. Hoare, and the neighbouring bankers. The establishment and its domestic and financial concerns are always open to inspection. JOHN ROBERTSON, Secretary.

UMBRELLAS.—W. and J. SANGSTER beg to call the attention of the Public to their GUINEA UMBRELLA, which, for durability and lightness, is not to be excelled.—140, Regent-street; and 94, Fleet-street.—N.B. A large stock of German Umbrellas, with best ivory handles, &c., from 18s. each. Also, ladies' Umbrellas, from 7s. 6d. to 21s. each.

SIX Pounds of good sound TEA for Eighteen Shillings.—The EAST INDIA TEA COMPANY, at their Establishment, No. 9, Great St. Helen's, E.C., have resolved, while the Merchants continue to supply the market so liberally, that the public shall reap the benefit.
No. 9, Great St. Helen's Churchyard, Bishopsgate.

BOARD and RESIDENCE.—LONDON and BRIGHTON.—Families, Ladies and Gentlemen, requiring superior accommodation, and an elegant home, may find all they can desire at No. 8, Clifford-street, Bond-street, London, or 7, Marine Parade, Brighton, where they will also find every comfort, combined with good cookery, superior Wines, and a capital Table. A Private Sitting-room may be had if required. Apply to Mrs. KING, as above.

IMPROVED ELASTIC WINTER GAITERS for Ladies, which afford convenience by drawing on without lacing or buttoning, and comfort and neatness, without pressure. They are made in black and coloured silks, cashmere, and worsted, of various textures, suitable for the carriage, promenade, or equestrian wear. Can be forwarded, in a letter, from POPE and PLANTE, Manufacturers of all the best descriptions of hosiery, 4, Waterloo-place, Pall mall.

EMPLOYMENT.—Persons having a little time to spare, are informed that Agents continue to be appointed in London and Country Towns by the EAST INDIA TEA COMPANY, for the sale of their celebrated TEA (Offices, 9, Great St. Helen's Churchyard, Bishopsgate-street). They are backed in almost every instance from one ounce to a pound, with the prices and weight marked on each packet, and but little trouble is occasioned by the sale; the license is only 11s. per annum, and many during the last seventeen years have realized considerable incomes by the Agency, without 1s. 1d. or loss. Applications to be made if by letter, post paid, as above

CITY EQUITABLE CLOTHING ESTABLISHMENT, No 8, Fleet-street, near Temple Bar.—Gentlemen in search of a Tailor, will run no risk by giving one trial to the proprietor of the above small concern. He is not only thoroughly capable of fitting them well, but is satisfied that his style, quality, and prices, are such as must in all respects give satisfaction. He uses materials which are cleaned or chasely combined to West-end Tailors. The only articles kept ready made are a choice assortment of the different descriptions of Waterproof Coats, really good, and very cheap, suitable for the present season. N.B. Coats repaired, cleaned, and dyed on the shortest notice.

DOVOR.—LONDON HOTEL.—W. J. HOLLYER begs most respectfully to inform the Nobility, Gentry, and Public in general, that he has entered upon the above old-established Hotel, which he has entirely refurnished and fitted up with every requisite for comfort and convenience. It is situated adjoining the Steam-packet Quay, near the Railway Terminus, the Custom-House, and Alien Office, and commands a fine view of the Harbour, Roadstead, and Coast. The charges will be moderate in any length of time, on terms that cannot fail to give satisfaction. W. J. H. trusts, by superior accommodation and moderation of charges, to merit the encouragement of the visitors to Dover and the Continent.—Excellent Stabling. Lock-up Coach-houses.

JAMES HEELEY and SONS beg most respectfully to inform their friends that they have REDUCED the price of the "Public School Pen," to justify continuing it, 2s. 6d. per box of Gross. On Gross Orders the reduction has been increased caused by the extension of Day school instruction, now so generally adopted, they have also introduced a second pen, designated THE IMPROVED SCHOOL PEN, of FINE and MEDIUM POINTS; and call the attention of the Managers of such Institutions to the same, which they offer to SCHOOLS at ONE SHILLING PER GROSS. A Sample Gross forwarded to order. The new pens will be of 64.—Mount-street, Birmingham. London Agent: K. GROOMBRIDGE, 5, Paternoster-row.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, 1st Nov., 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—I have just returned from an excursion amongst our most fashionable ateliers, with a view to furnishing your columns with something more worthy of your notice than the contents of my late letters. I have, however, seen nothing very extraordinary, the changes here being as yet mere modifications of former fashions, of which you have already had a description. I will, however, describe for you three models which our fashionable world has accepted without opposition. The first of these is a robe of Ispahan Pekin, of a pearl grey colour, ornamented upon the front of the skirt with a sort of pleating, à la vielle, in satin ribbon; corsage plain and high, with a ruche, which is made to meet that on the skirt; Oriental sleeves, and under sleeves in muslin, with ruffles of lace. The next was a robe of dark pouli de soie, of which the skirt was trimmed with a deep flounce, surmounted by a pinked ruche of similar materials: the corsage is half high, plain and pointed: the pelerine is fitted to this in the shape of a canezon behind; open upon the shoulder, forming a jockey over the sleeve, and finishing in a point upon the front of the corsage, trimmed all round with a pinked ruche, and the sleeves are frilled on the seam. The third dress consisted of an olive green robe of Constantine mohair, trimmed upon the front by a wide passementerie; the corsage plain and high, with plain sleeves; a surtout in black satin, falling a little below the knee, trimmed at its base by a deep flounce, en tablier, with wide pinked, bordered by narrow black lace, surmounted by a ruche of satin, which completes the costume. I had almost forgotten to say, that both sides of the front, the opening at the bottom, and the edge of the collar, are also trimmed with a ruche.

The pelerines now generally worn are made in four pieces, two for the front and two for the back, to the top of the shoulder; the latter are joined by a perpendicular seam

The morning dresses I have seen are as little remarkable as the others. The prettiest things of the sort that have fallen under my observation, are redingotes of Scotch Alpaca, blue and black, the skirts trimmed upon the front by a range of silk buttons. The corsage, which is high, is cut in the shape of a riding habit, and is closed by buttons, which come down to meet those on the skirt; the sleeves are Oriental, with muslin undersleeves and ruffles.

There is as yet no change in the form of hats, the only difference consisting in the materials of which they are composed, and it is not very likely that the shapes now in use will be much varied before the end of the year. In a visit which I lately paid to the saloons of Leclère, I obtained a glimpse of every thing. High, or partially high has as yet sanctioned. Amongst these novelties, I observed some white satin and green velvet hats, trimmed with long plumes; and others in blue African velvet, with three small plumes disposed en guirlande. As objects of novelty I shall only cite some hats trimmed, the shaded plumes of two colours; and some others of cut velvet and figured silk, trimmed either with lace, feathers, flowers, or velvet ornaments.

I now think I have given you the only things that have fallen under my notice worth description. Should, however, any thing very new or particularly tasty make its appearance, you may depend upon hearing of it from HENRIETTE DE B.

WINTER FASHIONS.

(Abridged from the "Ladies Gazette of Fashion."

Winter Costumes this season present unusual beauty and variety. Seldom has it fallen to our share (says the Ladies' Gazette of Fashion), to have so many elegant models for dress of every description as we have this month. In Cloaks, Mantelets and Pelisses, we have been particularly fortunate, having obtained a great number of very elegant and striking novelties. Of Walking Dresses, too, we have nearly thirty entirely new patterns, and of bonnets, hats and toubans, an almost endless variety: but to our robes, commencing with CHAPEAUX AND CAPOTES, the crowns of which are larger, the brims closer, and brought more over the forehead than usual. The most elegant carriage chapeaux, are those composed of an intermixture of black velvet and satin, the exterior trimmed with a heron plume, and the interior with small flowers; also those of pale violet velvet, lined with velours epingle, and trimmed with knotted marabouts, violets, and roses.

CLOAKS, MANTELETS, &c., present great variety. The favourite materials will be velvets, satins, and plain silks. Furs will be much worn, and will be much used for trimming both velvet and satin mantles. Muffs and cardinals are worn a little larger. We have just seen a very pretty cashmere cloak. It is trimmed with velvet, and besides being perfectly novel, has a very elegant appearance. The satin polonaise is very pretty, but only adapted for carriage dress. The paletot rause is to be superseded by an envelope, something between the shape of the paletot and a gentleman's great coat. It will be composed of drap-castorine, trimmed with ermine, and lined with fur, and will be made wide, the corsage high, and plain, with lappels; the collar will be covered with fur, and may be turned up to protect the ears and throat. The sleeve, in the coat form, but larger at the top, so as not to crush the sleeve of the dress, will be of an easy width to admit of being drawn with large fur cuffs.

ROBES, our bride will only allow us to glance at. A dréanne, called Alpaga, plain merinos, and poplins, will be much worn for half dress and the promenade; striped, figured, and shaded silks, satins and velvets, cashmeres and pekins, for evening dress. The redingote form is still in favour. High, or partially high corsages, are worn even in half dress Embroidery in silk is very fashionable Demi long hanging sleeves, and tight sleeves, are equally in vogue. Velvet will be in request for trimmings. Lace is still in favour, and also passementerie. Furbans will be much worn. Shades of green, brown, and grey, orange, dark blue, pansee, ruby, groseille, and light shades of red and yellow, are the fashionable colours.

FURS.—Furs are little understood in England. Our fair country-women are really seen to wear rubbish, which a Russian lady's maid would disdain. And this is not because, as is commonly imagined, furs are cheap and abundant in Russia. On the contrary, strange as it may appear, the great mass of furs used in Russia comes from London, and every fur is worth fifty or a hundred per cent. more there than in England. Even the famous Siberian sable is not Siberian; it comes from the Kurile islands in the Pacific, whither the Russian Government every other year despatch a vessel or two, which completes the circuit of the world, and returns laden with the productions of this distant region. Consequently, in London only sees well-dressed women with imitation sables, although the real skin does not cost above twelve shillings; the darkest-coloured from twenty to thirty; but the sable of the Kurile islands may run as high as six guineas a skin, and is much more lovely than our prize, whilst in the beauty of its long, thick, light-feeling, and dark-coloured hair, there is more difference than in the price. This is the sable used by the Russian dames; but in addition to this, two furs are generally worn in Russia which are almost unknown in England—the most valuable of all furs—the sea-otter and the black fox. The former is used for officers' cloak-collars, and this narrow strip cannot be obtained under ten pounds, in its most inferior qualities. The black fox is used for ladies' cloaks and muffs. A single collar of it is worth at least sixty guineas.—New Monthly Magazine.

POSTSCRIPT.

TRIAL OF O'CONNELL.

JUDGE BURTON'S CHARGE.

DUBLIN, Thursday Evening, Five o'Clock.

The Right Hon. the Lord Chancellor and the Right Hon. the Master of the Rolls opened the Court of Chancery to-day with the usual formalities. The judges all breakfasted with the Chancellor at his mansion in Stephen's-green, and afterwards proceeded in state to the Four Courts, in the hall of which his lordship was entitled to them and the law officers of the crown in the customary form. The hall, courts, and passages are crowded to a much greater extent than we remember for many years, owing, no doubt, to the unusual circumstance of so many state trials being expected to come on during, or immediately after, term After his lordship left the hall he took his seat on the bench in the Court of Chancery, at nearly two o'clock, when a number of gentlemen were called to the bar, and had the usual oaths administered to them.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.—The Hon. Mr. Justice Burton took his seat upon the bench shortly after one o'clock, at which time the court presented an appearance almost unprecedented for excitement and anxiety, it having been known that the grand jury before whom the bills of indictment against Mr. O'Connell and the other members of the Repeal Association would be preferred, was to be sworn; and also that his lordship's charge would be unusually interesting upon that account.

The galeries were crowded with ladies, and also with lawyers who could not find admission into their proper seats from the anxiety which prevailed amongst the junior members of the bar to witness the proceedings.

Judge Perrin entered the Court at 12 o'clock, and proceeded at once to swear in the gentlemen who were subsequently sworn in, and called to the bar before the Lord Chancellor.

David Charles La Touche, Esq., High Sheriff of the city of Dublin, and Charles Cobb, Esq., High Sheriff of the county, were in attendance at an early hour, as were also a large number of grand jurors for both city and county.

The city grand panel was first called upon a fine of £20., when, after some time, the proper number was sworn in. The same course was adopted with regard to the county grand jury.

The Right Hon. T. B. C. Smith, her Majesty's Attorney General, and Richard W. Greene, Esq., the Solicitor General, were in attendance.

Mr. Justice Burton then proceeded to charge the jury. He said, "Gentlemen of the Grand Jury of the county of the city of Dublin, there is not any of the ordinary business which makes it necessary for me to make any particular observations at the present time, and if any difficulty in the discharge of your duty occurs to you, the court will be ready at any time to give whatever advice or assistance which may be in its power. But, gentlemen, you are yourselves, I am sure, well aware that the present is a matter likely, and I believe it is intended, to be brought before you, of very great anxiety, and very great public feeling and I consider it my duty, in as summary a way as possible, to make such observations upon the subject alluded to as I hope may, in some measure, assist you in the discharge of those duties. Gentlemen, there is an indictment likely to be preferred for your consideration, and on the part of the state, as I know you are well acquainted with the informations against the parties who are to be indicted, said you in the discharge of your duty as grand jury they will be obliged to be prepared for their defence. You are, therefore, only to hear the evidence in support of the prosecution—the witnesses will be sworn by you, and you are not called upon to hear evidence plainly given, but you may cross-examine the witnesses, in order, if you considere it necessary, to form a satisfactory judgement as to their credit. If, upon a careful examination, the majority of the grand jury, amounting to at least 12, are satisfied that a sufficient case has been laid before them to show the propriety of putting the accused party or parties upon their trial, you must find a true bill. On the contrary, if you consider or are satisfied of the inconsistency of the evidence in support of it, you will ignore the bill, and the parties will be discharged from your jury. The sufficiency, therefore, of the evidence depends upon this, namely—whether, if the party were put on his trial upon a plea of not guilty, and no evidence was given upon his behalf, and that the whole case rested upon the evidence for the prosecution, he could justly be found guilty. Gentlemen, if you find the indictment to be true, or some one of the counts of the indictment to be true, it is sufficient to warrant you in finding bills; and in the present case, the counts are so various that I can form no opinion upon those counts which were found. When a bill is preferred against several persons, it may be found against only some of those persons, and registered against the rest, subject, however, to exception—namely, that a bill is preferred, charging two or more persons with attempt at conspiracy, it cannot be found against one of them only Gentlemen, I will now tell you that, as I understand, a bill is likely, and is intended to be submitted to you against a certain number of persons specified in it, charging them with a conspiracy—that is, with conspiracy together—and arguing amongst themselves, and concurring with one another, in a design to effect certain purposes unlawful, or, at least, illegal in their nature, whether in themselves unlawful or not, by unlawful means." In the course of his address, the learned judge alluded to all the important charges contained in the indictment preferred by the Attorney-General against the parties charged with conspiracy, &c. He dwelt upon the clauses that had reference to the "monster meetings," to the collection of money in the United Kingdom as well as in Ireland for the Arbitration Committee in America and Mr. Steele, and to the libels in the newspapers, but at the late hour at which he concluded it is impossible to give more than the above meagre outline.

At the conclusion of his charge, the Attorney-General intimated that the indictments would be sent before the jury at eleven o'clock next morning.

It will be seen that the state prosecutions are to be tried by the City, and not the County Grand Jury.

CHARGE OF PERJURY AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT INFORMER.—During the morning an application was made to the Clerk of the Crown, on behalf of Mr. Higgins, to receive informations against Mr. Hughes, the Government reporter, but that functionary refused to accede to the application. A similar application was made to Judge Burton, after his lordship had charged the jury. A number of affidavits were tendered to the court in support of the application. After considerable discussion, the court determined to receive the affidavits next morning.

HER Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, accompanied by their Serene Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Hohenlohe Langenbourg, took leave of her Majesty the Queen Dowager at Whitley-court, Worcestershire, on Thursday morning, for her residence, Frogmore-house, Windsor. The Royal Duchess arrived at Frogmore, attended by Sir George Couper, in the afternoon.

DEPARTURE OF THE GRAND DUKE MICHAEL OF RUSSIA.—On Thursday his Imperial Highness left Mivart's Hotel for Greenwich. His Excellency Baron Brunow, M. de Berg, M. de Koudriaffsky, and Chevalier Benkhausen, had preceded his Imperial Highness to Woolwich. On reaching Greenwich, his Imperial Highness was conducted over the Hospital by the Lieutenant-Governor, Rear-Admiral Sir James A. Gordon, and on leaving the chapel, the Grand Duke visited the respectedand gallant Governor, Sir Robert Stopford, and about half-past eleven proceeded to Woolwich, to embark for Rotterdam.

COMMISSION TO INQUIRE INTO THE TENURE OF LAND IN IRELAND.—This Commission consists of five gentlemen, with Lord Devon as Chairman—their names are Sergeant Alexander Hamilton, Mr. Pigot, and Mr. Wynne, of Hazlewood, both Tories Wms. Tighe, of Woodstock, and More O'Ferrall, M.P., both Liberals. We regret very much to state that Mr. O'Ferrall has declined to act, principally in consequence of the state of his health, which would not justify him in undergoing the anxiety and fatigue to which, as a member of the Commission, he would be subject.

THE WEST INDIA MAIL.—The packet, the Dee, left Southampton at four o'clock on Thursday, with the West Indian and South American mails, also taking out between seventy and eighty passengers, among whom is Sir William and Lady Colebrooke, the Governor of the Duke of Brabant, who is this country by the February packet.

The first stone of the proposed new church at Kensall-green was laid on Thursday by the Rev. Dr. Hawtrey, Lonsdale principal of King's College), in the presence of a large number of the most respectable inhabitants of the district. The archdeacon was assisted in the interesting ceremony by several of the local clergy.

MORE POLICE FOR WALES.—Application has been made to the Police Commissioners for another detachment of the Force, to proceed to the disturbed districts of Wales. The whole of the A division has already been already drafted to Wales, the Commissioners ordered Superintendent Greenville, of the L division, to select 13 constables and a sergeant from his division; and Sergeant Ludlow, No 7, and 13 constables, immediately volunteered for the service, and were ordered off by railway last evening.

FOREIGN.

SPAIN.—TELEGRAPHIC DESPATCHES.—BARCELONETTA, Oct. 29.—Two war steamers from Tarragona have landed 1,000 infantry. The captain-general has sent siege ammunition to Girona. The batteries of the town and forts have not resumed the firing

MADRID, Oct. 29.—The Queen's troops have entered Leon. All the promoters of the rebellion have been thrown into the dungeons.

We have received the Madrid journals of the 26th ult; the news which they contain had reached us previously by telegraph. In the report of the speech of the Minister of Finance, on opening the session of the Cortes, he declared the majority of the Queen, the cabinet declares its conviction of having, in this affair, consulted the national will, and of the measure being of a nature to give force to the Government and tranquility to the nation.

PORTUGAL.—A counter-revolution has been attempted in Greece. General Colocotroni, one of King Otho's aides-de camp, attempted to seduce the troops to an abandonment of their allegiance. The plot was detected, and the traitor denounced. His Majesty convened the Council of State, and solemnly denied any participation in, or knowledge of, the design. The reluctance which his Majesty evinced to break up the office of Count Armansperg, appears unlike to constitutional rule had nearly involved himself and his royal master in unretrievable ruin, created some doubts of the integrity of purpose by which the King was actuated in making the dismissal. He was, however, at length surrendered to the authorities; and, with a moderation which has distinguished the leaders of the revolution throughout their proceedings, was merely ordered to quit the country he had sought to deprive of its newly acquired liberties.

PUBLIC CHARITY, AND THE SLAVERY OF THE POOR.

In proportion to our deep and unfeigned regret at the frightful amount of family destitution which prevails among the struggling classes in the metropolis and its thickly populated suburbs, is our true gratification in acknowledging the free and noble spirit with which the press has come forward—almost with one accord to answer the dictates of humanity, and to point to more prosperous society its path of duty in relieving the miserable indigence of the poor. With exhortations to the exercise of the beautiful virtue of Charity—such exhortations as honour the hearts of our public writers [illegible], however, been coupled the most harrowing exposures of oppression, the most touching details of persecuted want; and these, it is hoped, will have aroused the indignation,—as powerfully as the bold assertion of a noble principle may have marked out the responsibilities,—of the whole Christian community. It is more of these exposures, than of the simple principle of charity, that we have now to speak. We ardently hope that the latter will be actively vindicated among us, without more necessity for stern enjoinment either from the pulpit or the pen. We believe the cry of the poor to have gone forth to a public that cannot be without a heart—but, rather that from the inmost depths of its spirit, has responded, and will continue to respond, to that impressive call. The sources of private benevolence are opening upon the wretched, and pouring fertilizing streams of bounty upon the arid deserts of poverty and woe. Balm is flowing into the wounds of want—and generously and gloriously let it flow warmly on. Let the magistrates make themselves industriously the bankers of the poor—let the poor boxes be fast and freely filled and replenished for their abounding necessities—let the virtue of brotherhood make itself felt in the bosoms of the prosperous—and, although there be no law, but the bitter law of the workhouse, to meet the emergencies of general destitution, yet by such means shall individual misery be assisted, and hope be taught, if not to burn brightly, at least to flicker, within the homes and hearts of thousands of the poor. Fire, too, shall warm them as well as hope—and they shall have food along with charity;—cloathing shall allay their winter of sorrow—and they shall have a bed, from whose pillow they will murmur prayerful blessings upon the authors of their newgot comfort, sympathy, and relief. And blessings for ever unto the wealthy are the prayers of the poor!

To turn now, however, from the question of mere relief, to those exposures at which we have hinted, let us see if we cannot aid in fixing the public mind as much in anger as in sorrow—in heartloathing as in grief—upon the horrible system they have developed; and, if we cannot suggest a legislative remedy, at least try to show how society may take the sternest means of the oppressed destitute into its own hands, and lay the axe of its moral influence at the very root of the baneful evil by which it is shocked. The police offices, for the last few days, have exhibited a series of cases of extreme wretchedness, brought under the notices of the magistrates, in the form of charges for illegal pawning, by certain grovelling harpies of a nefarious traffic, against the starving and struggling victims of their merciless cupidity. The effect of the exposures has generally been relief of the misery instead of punishment of the crime—a result which has been hailed by humanity and warmed the sympathies of society towards the classes oppressed. The poor creatures whose cases have been brought forward, are labouring sempstresses—workwomen, employed by wholesale tailors of a low caste grasping middlewomen cheap grinding slopsellers—merciless Jews and persons of such social calibre—who triumph most in the profits which they wring from the poorest vitals—most glory in the gain which comes of toil, and tears, and grief. These wretches (it is of no use to mince terms in talking of their caste), employ hundreds of poor persons in their lowly occupation of making shirts, trousers, and general clothing, at three half-pence, twopence, or threepence per article—the workpeople to give security for the material, and find their own thread. By labour the most wasting and incessant—the most grinding and tiring, and unhealthy—the most tedious and enduring, for it steals eighteen hours from the day—by such labour it is impossible for the strong and industrious to earn more than six or seven shillings per week—and besides rent and candles to be found (fire, alas! out of the question), there are often young helpless children to be supported by hapless mothers out of this miserable pittance. Weak and more weak the wasting labourer grows—consumption and disease are engrafted upon poverty—the health fails—the work decreases in the amount performed—starvation's gaunt skeleton comes and stalks upon the bedless floor—and the mother, without hope, or food, or money, looks at her pining children, and, seizing upon the small modicum of coarse merchandize entrusted to her upon security, goes forth and pawns it for a meal! The middlewoman is at her heels, and she is in a few hours before a magistrate; but the Christian dispenser of justice is shocked at the afflicting story, narrated to him in its bitter truth, and confirmed by the squalid emaciation of the weeping culprit; and, as a consequence, pity and commiseration take the place of punishment, and the child of misery is afforded a temporary relief. Such has been the history of the cases which have, within the last few days, brought to the police-courts of London these poor sempstresses under the immediate protection of the human public. It is clear that the moral guilt of the dishonesty of the illegal pawners lies with the taskmasters who give such infamously low remuneration for most toiling work in the middlewomen, who, in heartless idleness, step in between the miserable employers and the miserably employed—in the shocking system of security which helps the grinder to grind—and in the ready negligence of the pawnbroker, who affords this unhappy race of beings the means of borrowing upon what he knows is not their own. The system is one of ingrained dishonesty; and of the many thieves that work it, the poor victim is the least.

We shall not particularize all the harrowing instances which have latterly proved the truth of our assertion; but take from the police cases of Wednesday one only—in which, by the way, the poor applicant for the magistrate's advice had committed no dishonesty. Mr. Broderip had sent Ellis to her room, and this is that officer's report

> He went early in the morning to No. 4, Browning place, where the poor applicant, Ellen Myers, said she resided, and there, in a small room, which, though cleanly under the circumstances, presented every appearance of great destitution, he found the poor woman and her aged mother at work making up fustian dresses—an operation which, from the resistance offered by the tough rigidity of the material to the passage of the needle, is one of the most laborious natural employments. This, together with the unpleasant odour which the fustian emits when freshly fabricated, renders the work very fatiguing and unwholesome. There were two children in the room, one six and the other seven years old, whose appearance clearly evidenced the pinched economy to which they were necessarily compelled to submit. In one corner of the room was a wretched bed, the residue place of the whole family, the only covering for which was a single quilt, scanty and threadbare. From the whole of the observations made by Ellis the poor woman's condition was ten times worse than one would be led to suppose from her statement to the Court, and, so far from her being only 7s. 6d in debt, all that they had except such covering as nature required was out as security will the pawnbroker. In answer to the inquiries of Ellis, the poor woman stated that the utmost she and her mother could earn by the extremest labour was from 7s. to 8s. per week, from which, she had to deduct the rent before she could think of expending any of the remainder for food, fuel, or covering. Ellis at once paid the arrear due to the landlord, and having left some shillings for immediate occasions, hastened to report to the magistrate the result of his inquiries. Mr. Broderip, regretting that the exhausted state of the poor box did not allow him to do more, directed that £3 should be expended in purchasing clothings and procuring them some warmer covering for the winter. At this moderate rate one wretched family has been rendered comparatively happy by "a visit to the indigent-room keeper

We pray our readers to take the hint of the last paragraph—to seek out such cases as these, or, at least, to remember the poor-box, and give their mite to solace the sufferings of the lowly and the sad; but, for society at large, we ask it to grapple with the whole question involved in such expositions as the above. It is clear that the poor victims of the mines and factories never endured a more horrible slavery than that which has been undergone by the famishing workwomen employed by the wholesale slopsellers, and Jew clothes speculators, of London, and some large provincial towns, but of the great metropolis especially. We are ready to admit, that the evil is one which it would be extremely difficult to legislate for; and that private benevolence might do more for the sufferers than law-making in the way of relief. But there is one preventive of the base oppression which strikes us as practicable, and which we at once urge upon the public to direct against the merciless traffickers in hope and health, who give work, not to aid industry, but to crush independence, and to quench life. Let fair-dealing persons of all ranks refuse to buy the merchandise, wholesale or retail, of any masters but those who will state and attest the rate of remuneration at which they pay their poor sempstresses; and if that rate be as cruel, avaricious, tyrannising, and destructive, as it now ordinarily is—if it be such as to produce and continue the present destitution—scout the masters as what they are, mere heartless brutes, with no god but their money, and no altar but their desk. There are honest men who will pay better wages, and with trifling difference, indeed, in the price of their merchandise; and let society use its personal influence in putting down the rogues.

It is well known that these puffing slopsellers are among the most remorseless of the impostors of London. They live upon misleading advertisements absorb more money than would make their wages fair; and, while they increase their traffic, increase also the flood of misery by which it is maintained. How many a gentle and suffering woman pays in privation for the abominable doggrel which gulls the public with its lie, day after day, in the advertising columns of the press. How many a widow has wanted and orphan starved because of the grinding competition of these reckless falsehoods. And the Shylocks never care in what sort of attraction they trade. It was but the other day that one of them headed his advertisement the "Death of Elton," made his Jew venture upon the appalling calamity of a wreck at sea, in which many had perished—sported with the feelings of a family of orphan children—and then gradually plunged into praises of the wretched fustian which might have been starving the victims who were making it into clothes! But it has been truly said by the Times that these things will not bear the light, and the light has been thrown upon them!

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, NOVEMBER 7.

SPAIN

The news from Spain, received to-day, is very important, and well worthy the most serious attention. The pregnant question has been examined by committees of both houses, and the ministerial project approved of. M. Martinez de la Rosa reported to the Senate, and M. Figueras to the Congress. Both of these gentlemen confined their remarks to the question itself, and made no allusion to the state of the country. As I anticipated, there will be much opposition to the project—not that for a moment it can be imagined that the ministers will be in a minority. The question lies not in the Chambers, but in the disorganised state of the whole kingdom. From these will arise the most serious results. In the Senate, M. Joaquin Francisco Campuzano, well known in the diplomatic circle, has laid on the table an amendment, couched in the following terms:—"The General Cortes declare, that her Majesty, Queen Isabella II., shall exercise the royal authority, with the assistance of a Council of State, whose functions shall cease on the day on which the constitutional law recognises her majority. The Council of State to be composed of three members and two and members, to be named by the Cortes in the same act of the declaration of the majority. The powers of the Council to be confined to the giving of advice, in writing, to the Queen . . . . . where her Majesty shall have to exercise the rights which the Constitution gives to the King." &c. &c.

In the Congress it is said that MM. Bernaber, Florez, Orejero, Moras, and Crooke intend to propose a resolution to the effect "that the Ministers, having violated the Constitution, should be called to the bar of the house." The debate will be stormy, and there is little doubt that the speeches of the Opposition will be directed more to the people than to fair and legitimate discussion. In the meantime, it is generally acknowledged that the present Ministers must go out, and report states that they will be replaced by M. Olozaga, as Minister for Foreign Affairs and President of the Council—M. Cortese, or M. Olivano, Home Department—M. Mazzredo, the friend, indeed bosom friend, of General Narvaez, War Department—M. Cantero, Finances—M. Luzuriaga, Justice—and M. Frias, Marine. M. Lopez is to be named President of the Superior Tribunal of Justice M. Isturiz is to be elected President of the Congress; and M. Manzano de la Rosa, to be created Count of Alliance, is to be the new Ambassador to the Court of the Tuileries. On the 31st, Madrid was tranquil, but serious apprehensions were entertained that, when Isturiz manifested would rise en masse, and demand, among other subjects of much discussion, is the immense sum of money received for the sale of national property, of which no clear account has as yet been given. It would appear, that up to the end of May last, 154,077 estates have been sold, producing 4,935,100,106 réals.

The insurrection in different parts of the kingdom occupies daily the attention of the ministers, who find themselves in a difficult position. The different captain generals demand reinforcements, and the Government is obliged to demand troops for the protection of Madrid.! It is true that Leon and Saragossa have surrendered, but other places have declared against the Government, and the disposable force is not sufficient to meet every exigency. The town of Leon is in the hands of the Government, but the insurgents escaped, and are revolutionizing La Mancha and Old Castile. The capitulation of Saragossa may be considered rather as a compromise than a victory, for General Concha was obliged to consent to the National Guards retaining their arms. The instant the insurrection assumes a strong progress, he assured that Saragossa will again declare for the Central Junta. The accounts from Galicia are most alarming. A private letter which I have before me states that Garrea, the private secretary to Espartero, had arrived the port of Vigo, and that 20,000 muskets had been landed. The movement commenced by the National Guards, who fired on the troops and wounded Colonel Suazo, and who were soon joined by the officers and men of the Provisional Regiment of Lugo. The garrison of Ferol declares, which commands the bay, capitulated. At the departure of my letter no junta had been named, the chief authority was invested in a Catalonian named Buch. The troops who remained faithful to the Government, had intrenched themselves in an old Chelsea which commands the bay. The Captain-General had ordered General Conner to march against the insurgents at the head of 2,000 men, and it was expected that the battering artille would be before Vigo on the 30th ult. The Vice of Galicia had been declared in a state of siege. Vigo has only a common wall with a fort flanked by four bastions. I am inclined to believe that the insurrection is fast extending; whether the insurgents will succeed is problematical, but all those who know anything of Spain are aware that no opinion can be formed as to the result of events in that unhappy country. It is said that the notorious General Nogueras had landed in Gibraltar, from whence he could easily communicate with the less affected in Malaga and Seville. We are without any very recent news from Catalonia. On the 29th ult., Sanz, who having received a reinforcement from Tarragona, and who independent of the troops in the different fortifications, was at the head of 6,000 men, wrote to the Central Junta, stating "that if, within half an hour the firing against Garcia and others had not ceased, he would bombard Barcelona, and reduce it to ashes." The Central Junta replied that they were not to be intimidated by threats, and that they were determined to fire on Sanz, Clot, and Garcia, should the result even be the destruction of Barcelona. The courage of the Junta was not to be stamped, and that it was driven to desperate means, they had in their power a terrible vengeance." By the last accounts both parties continued firing at each other, without any real result; General Prim was firing away at Gerona, and the insurgents were in high spirits. It was, however, expected that they would be obliged to capitulate.

PORTUGAL.

Advices from Portugal of the 2nd inst. confirm the former report of an intended re-construction of the cabinet. The Duke of Palmella, the Marquis of Saldanha, and Gomes de Castro will all take office.

ITALY

A sanguinary quarrel took place at Ancona on the 31st of October, between the different troops forming the garrison; the event was considered of such importance that a detachment of Dragoons had been disarmed by order of the Governor-General. It was generally supposed that the insurgents were at the bottom of this unfortunate affair. A letter from Rome, dated the 22d, says "that a conspiracy had been discovered in the district of Frosinone, which was to be conducted by 400 armed men. The miscreants intended murdering all the persons employed about the house, and then flying to the mountains and organising themselves as banditti. Fortunately the plot was discovered in time, and the ringleaders placed in separate cells."

FRANCE

His Majesty Louis Philippe and all the royal family continue to inhabit the Palace of St. Cloud. His Majesty enjoys most excellent health, and makes frequent excursions to Versailles. Great preparations are being made for the visit of the Duke and Duchess of Nemours to England. The visit of Queen Victoria to Chateau d'Eu seems to have infused new life into the court—hitherto dull and monotonous; it is now, so I am most confidentially assured, to be one of the gayest in Europe, and that a series of fêtes and balls will be given this winter in the Palace of the Tuileries. Leopold and the Queen have returned to Belgium. Letters have been received at the Palace, announcing that the Princess Clemence and Prince Augustus of Cobourg intend visiting Paris in the month of January, and to remain a month. The Princess Clementine is a great favourite in the royal family. The Duke Ferdinand of Saxe-Cobourg quitted Cobourg on the 24th October, with his son, for Vienna. The Moniteur Algérien of the 30th Oct. announces "that by a royal decision, dated the 18th of October, his Royal Highness the Duke d'Aumale had been named to the command of the province of Constantine." It is the general opinion that ere long the duke will replace Marshal Bugeaud as Governor-General of Algeria.

It was reported yesterday that, owing to ill health, M. Lacave-Laplagne, the Minister of Finance, intended retiring from office. Should he do so, other changes will take place in the ministry.

The Duke d'Aumale left Marseilles for Genoa, reached Florence on the 23rd of Oct.; the next day he visited the picture gallery in the Palace Pitti, he then dined with the Grand Duke, and left Florence at 7 o'clock.

Amongst our recent arrivals in Paris, is Lord Brougham. His Lordship after passing a few days with his friend, M. Dupin, goes to his estate, Cannes, where he will remain a month or more.

The Gérant, or responsible Editor, of the legitimate journal "La France," has been indicted by the public prosecutor. He is accused "with an attack on principles and form of the government, founded in 1830, and against the rights of the King held by the wish of the nation and the Constitutional Charter—with dispute adhesion to another form of government, in attributing as claim on the throne a person proscribed by the laws, and in expressing the wish, the hope or menace, of a restoration of the fallen dynasty, and the destruction of the constitutional monarchical order—with offences against the members of the Royal Family, and lastly with attempts to excite hatred or contempt of the government of the king." It is expected that the trial will take place on the 9th.

The south of France is again the prey of a most frightful inundation. The last accounts, dated the 4th, state that at about two kilometres above Arles the bank of the Rhone had been broken. On the 2nd, the bridges of Mêrs, Manosque, Mirabeau, Pertuis, and Bonpas were carried away. The environs of Grenoble were covered with water; indeed the most serious disasters may be expected.

During the season of 1841 to 1842 the number of wolves killed or trapped in France was 741; wild boars, 490; foxes, 2895; weasels, 331; and wild cats, 1626.

The Journal de Sarrebrouck, of the 31st October, relates that at Bher Rauschbach, in Prussia, a peasant's wife was delivered of four children, three boys and a girl. The mother and children were in perfect health.

There was consumed in Paris, during the month of October, 6186 oxen, 1749 cows, 5507 calves, and 26,068 sheep; being 1,000 oxen and 1,000 sheep less, and 6 cows and 374 sheep more, than during the month of October last year.

The health of Count de Survilliers (Joseph Buonaparte) is completely re-established.

We continue very dull in the musical world. The rehearsals of "Maria de Rohan" continue almost daily; it will be brought out about the 15th. In the last act there is a most beautiful trio sung by Gruai, Ponchard, and Remeni.

The ballad written by Donizetti for Madame Brumbilla, is one of the most delicious morsels ever written by him. In the Grand Opera every thing is ready for "Don Sebastian." Duprez Gras has arranged her dispute with the director, and has signed an engagement for three years. M. Scribe has also been engaged Madame Potier has gone back to the Opéra Comique.

It is said, that during the season, a new opera, by Halle, the libretto by Scribe, will be brought out. A new opera, in three acts, by Auber, will also be produced. The poem of the opera, in five acts, by Listz, is from the romance "Consuelo," by Georges Sand. The principal characters are to be thus distributed—Consuelo, by Madame Stolz; La Corilla, by Madame Dorus; Marie-Therèse, by Madame Sedaine Méguilles; Albert, by Barrolhet; Anzoleto, by Duprez; and Porpore, by Levasseur.

The son of Hummel, a very young man, brought out at Weimar an opera called "Hunmer de Merasbourg."

The sisters, Milanollo, are playing with great success at Milan. The concerts in Vienna produced upwards of 50,000 florins. "I Lombardi alla prima Crociata" opera, by Verdi, has been well received at Lucca. Next spring there will be a German opera at the theatre Carcano at Milan. It is expected that the Vienna troop will give a certain number of representations. A new opera, called "Anelda di Messino," by Vera, has been much applauded at Milan. Salvi intended bringing out the season his "Lara." "Osti e non Osti," by Persiani, is now performing at Genoa to crowded houses. A new opera has been brought out at the theatre Fondo, at Naples, called "Mathia l'Invalido," by Majo. It was a complete fiasco. "Tu Sonne d'un Nuit," Mendelssohn, was enthusiastically applauded at the Summer Theatre of Potsdam. Restigui has composed a psalm for Aix la-Chapelle; he also intends bringing out an opera.

Madame Paradol, the ex-reigning queen of the Theatre Francais, died on the 1st. at Nanterre.

FOUR O CLOCK

The following most interesting news has just been received from Spain:—

"SANTIAGO, 26th October.—All the troops in the garrison of Vigo have joined the insurgents, and sworn to die with them in defence of their liberties. The whole of Galicia will follow the example. The frigate La Constitucion, cruising before Vigo, has declared for the Central Junta. The Castaos de Castro was taken by assault, by the National Guards, yesterday. A company of the regiment of Zamora, which left Pontevera with the political chief to attack the insurgents, went over to them. The important city of Ferrol has declared for the Central Junta. Pontevedra has also declared against the Government. The insurgents are marching in all directions, joined in every village by the peasantry. We have arms in abundance. General Iriarte is idolized by the people.

The bull fight at Madrid, the produce of which was devoted to the construction of a church, realized 29,634 réals!

THE THEATRES.

ADELPHI

On Monday last a new drama in three acts, entitled "The Bohemians; or, The Rogues of Paris," was produced at this theatre with complete success. It is a free adaptation from the French of "Eugene Sue," by Mr. E. Stirling, whose pen must go at a railroad pace, for it was but a week before that he produced another piece from the French. The following explanatory announcement appears at the head of the bills: "The Bohemians are that class of criminals whose existence is a problem—their conditions and their fortunes an enigma—living no resting place—who are never to be found, and yet are to be seen every where—who have no trade, yet live by professions the greater number of whom rise without knowing where they shall dine—rich to-day—dying with hunger to-morrow—ready to live honestly if they can, and otherwise if they cannot." Such are the chief parts of the personages who appear in this drama, connected with some others of more interest and less depravity. These, brought together in an artfully interwoven story, heightening to the close, with a due allowance of the most approved melo-dramatic effects, combine to form a drama of no ordinary effect. In the first act, Louise (a betrayed and forsaken girl), attempts suicide by plunging into the Seine: she is saved by a drunken Bohemian (Breve Bavar), who had formerly been sent to the galleys for some crime which he did not commit, and who, on his return, went half-crazed on finding his wife, whom he tenderly loved, had died through sorrow, on which he fled from the world and joined the wandering Bohemians. The King of the Bohemians, who passes under the title, Le Chevalier de mont Orgereil, induces Breve Bavar to murder Louise, by making him believe that she was concerned in his wife's death, in order that he might be carry into effect a marriage between Louise's seducer (a roué who had joined the gang), and a rich heiress, by which he should gain 200,000 francs. Breve Bavar undertakes the task with horrid satisfaction, and here the interest of the piece is fairly excited. The scene in the quarries of Mont Martre, where it is contrived that Breve Bavar should meet, was most splendidly acted by O. Smith and Mrs. Yates. About to perpetrate the murder, he discovers that she is his own child—the daughter of his beloved Marie, and not only that, but she possesses documents exculpating him from his imputed crime, and fixing it on the real perpetrator, who is discovered at the end of the piece to have been Le Chevalier, the King of the Bohemians. This is the truly interesting portion of the piece—the rest is common-place, and to be found in every melodrama, at the same time highly effective. The other characters are mere accessories to the development of the main story. The principal of those were Lolot (Miss E. Stanley), a French grisette, in love with Bagnolet (Mr. Wright), an itinerant vendor of cigars, and a Parisian guide. Wright's part was regular broad English farce, and kept the audience in a roar. His pas de deux with Miss Stanley in the third was irresistibly comic, and contrasted pleasantly with the savage grandeur of O. Smith's acting. We must not omit to say that Messrs. Lyon, Maynard, and Wieland, performed most admirably in their respective parts. The piece is beautifully got up, and, no doubt, will have a considerable run.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Ludere qui nescit, campestribus obstinet armis.

Thus saith the great philosopher of civilization; his meaning—in truth, the reader needeth not the telling—being, that without betting there must be no racing. His maxim has been implicitly followed ever since the Olympic Games were revived among us under the title of "The Turf." Thus hath the course gone on, and prospered: but lo! its glories are jeopardized its hopes have received a heavy blow. In the course of the last week, certain persons—moved thereto, no doubt, by force of conscience—caused to be served on my Lords Eglinton and George Bentinck, together with Colonel Peel and the Hon. Charles Greville, suits, or other demonstrations of action, under a statute of Queen Anne, whereby betting on horse races is strictly prohibited as "common gambling." It is said that one of the noble lords entered White's with his hands full of the aforesaid oblong missives, to the consternation of its bay-window, and that the honourable the Clerk of the Council by no means took the announcement of an intention to turn him from the evil of his ways as a piece of personal courtesy.

Be this as it may, there can be no doubt that a batch of great men is fairly worth the prosecution for misdemeanours, and that the damages are laid at some fifty thousand pounds or thereabouts. The law so decrees it—and one of the parties, at all events, cannot quarrel with the taste that refers raising issues to the statutes at large—for he himself has always had recourse to them in any difficulty arising out of his turf career. Whatever the result of the pending prosecutions—and what that result will be, there can be little doubt—good will come of their having been instituted. If betting lays open to ruinous losses the person who practises it, there must be an end of the ring—as, also, if its business in future must be understood to be carried on by sufferance. Mercury knows there was danger enough in meddling with the odds before; but if a man is to pay £30 for every £10 he wins or loses, even if he be permitted to do there are a few who still enquire about the Derby, and the Olympics of 1844. This former issue is by no means satisfactorily situated. With two horses before Christmas at 8 to 1, the market is thrice as bad as it was this time last year, when it was indifferent enough for any main purpose. But the only article in it is this extravagant Derby, and therefore it finds customers. The average may be thus quoted:—

LAST BETTING

6 to 1 agst Scott's lot; 10 to 1 agst Cadland's lot; 16 to 1 agst Forth's lot, 8 to 1 agst Rattan, 8 to 1 agst Ugly Buck; 25 to 1 agst Orlando; 30 to 1 agst Jerry; 30 to 1 agst Leander; 40 to 1 agst Delightful colt; 50 to 1 agst King of the Gypsies; 50 to 1 agst Hugh-a-Ballagh; 66 to 1 agst Valtri; 66 to 1 agst Governor; 66 to 1 agst Lorimer.

While the Agincourt was at Manilla, in April, and only eight days there, she took 15 men from by the station. The Admiral, Sir Thomas [illegible] perly thought it advisable immediately to put to sea, which he [illegible] in her, while there, tells us he visited the Royal Manufactory of Tobacco, the Sovereign of Spain's workshop; and to his astonishment found that 6000 persons were employed daily, the whole year round, in the fabrication of cheroots.

Last week a respectable farmer named Messenger, who stands charged with the murder of one of his servants on the farm at Gaddesbury, in Leicestershire, was admitted to bail, when he invited his sureties and several other friends to a feast to celebrate his release. The party drank ardent spirits to such excess that one man, named Johnston, of Rotherby, died in consequence.

We learn from Berlin that M. Grube, who left that city some time ago, to fix the post of Consul-General of Prussia in China, is to remain some time in the East Indies—sons in the East. Before he proceeds to China, it is said the Prussian government contemplates a good market in China for wool, and manufactures of cotton and flax.

By Royal mandate, the degree of D.D. has been conferred on the Rev. R. Phelps, Master of Sydney Sussex College, the son of a batter, formerly carrying on business in the town of Devonport, and brother to Mr. Phelps, the eminent tragedian. It is remarkable circumstance that the two brothers should have become distinguished ornaments in professions so opposed to each other as are the stage and the pulpit

The anniversary of the memorable "Gunpowder Plot" in 1605, having this year fallen on Sunday, the numerous urchins who are in the annual practice of exhibiting "Guy" in the streets of the metropolis, had to delay their "pleasure in burning" till Monday, but either owing to the unpropitious state of the weather, or the want of "public contributions" to sustain his notoriety with becoming dignity, the immortal Guy was unusually scarce. The only result of the celebration of that day, under circumstances that one would suppose should have become distinguished ornaments in professions so opposed to each other as are the stage and the pulpit

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

CHINA AND INDIA.

On Monday last the overland mail from India reached town, bringing dates from Bombay the 2d of September, Calcutta 31st of September, Delhi 21st ditto, Lahore 16th ditto, China 3rd of August, Singapore, Penang, and Malacca 7th of October. The intelligence from China adds nothing to the news brought from Hong Kong by the Sesostris steam-ship, which we have already published in extenso. Its importance. An insurrection had broken out at Lahore on the 15th of September, when the Maharaja Shere Sing, his son Purtaub Sing, and their wives and children were murdered and Dr. Prese killed. The instigator of these atrocities was the all powerful Minister of the Maharaja Lujpat Sing, who had [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] he possibly can from them; and on one occasion this system of royal plunder—long felt to be intolerable—roused the indignation of the chief Sirdars, who, expecting to be aided by the populace, flew to arms, and assumed a hostile attitude, but were, after a brief struggle, signally defeated.

The Prince Sultar Jung, who was last month stated to be a prisoner at Candahar, has escaped from that place. On his departure he proceeded towards Scinde, for the purpose of soliciting the protection of the British, but was prevailed upon to remain in Lower Affghanistan, on the representation of some chief (name unknown), who held out to him a flattering prospect of success from their united exertions.

BUNDELKHUND—GWALIOR.

The disturbances in these states continue much as before. Gwalior is still extremely turbulent, but whether we shall meddle with its affairs is very doubtful The rumours of our intention to do so have created some alarm, and preparations have been made to meet the apprehended aggression. The details of events in these countries, even were they not quite cast into the shade by the all-important news from Lahore, possess too little interest to the English readers to render an account of them at all desirable. There are reports to the effect that an army is about to be assembled for service in Bundelkhund, but all military arrangements at present in contemplation will undergo great change, in consequence of the revolution in the Punjaub. Major Sleeman has been removed, it is reported, from his appointment as commissioner, for writing a letter in the Bombay Times regarding the administration of affairs in Bundelkhund. It is uncertain whether this really be the case, though it has been pretty confidently asserted, and I will not, therefore, indulge in any comments on the proceeding.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The following miscellaneous particulars are from details in the papers. They contain confirmation of the wreck of the Marmion, with afflicting particulars —

Lord Ellenborough remains at Calcutta. He has been further feted by the military, and an entertainment (ball and supper) has been got up in his honour by the other portion of the community.

A notification has been issued, forbidding the publication by servants of Government of information, or documents, they become possessed of officially.

Some important cases have been tried at Bombay, both during the term and at the Criminal Sessions, which latter have just terminated. The suit instituted by Dhackjee Dahjee against the East India Company, for trespass, has terminated in a verdict for the defendants, on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction over the governor in council, whose act the trespass was. Dhackjee, it is said, will appeal to the Queen in council. A memorial from him to the Court of Directors, on the subject of the Government's treatment of him, went home by the last mail.

The Governor of Bombay, Sir George Arthur, has returned to the presidency, from Poonah. During his absence he once or twice visited the ex-Ameers of Scinde, at their places of confinement at Sapoor—a mark of kindness which, says the Bombay Times, "proved eminently gratifying to them."

NORTH WEST PROVINCES.—The Governor-General has ordered the formation, on the banks of the river Jumna, during the approaching cold season, of a force consisting of between eighteen and twenty thousand men, to be called the "Army of Exercise." It has been generally supposed this force is intended for employment against Gwalior; I fancy, however, it was directed to be organised as a mere piece of display, like the famous army assembled at Feerozpore at the close of the late Affghan campaign. By a piece of singular good luck, Reppeers highly probable that the troops may be employed in the Punjaub.

The London mail of August the 5th reached Bombay, per Atalanta steamer, the 5th of September, Madras the 15th, and would reach Calcutta about the 21th

The Rajah of Joudpore (Marwar) expired on the 5th ult. He left no lineal descendants, and will be succeeded, it is supposed, by a Rajah of Kader, a principality to the southward of Joudpore. The Prince is about fourteen or fifteen years of age The death of the old Rajah is rather a happy event than otherwise, as he had long been very troublesome to our Government.

Mr. Clerk—so long agent for the Governor-General at Umballa, and who was a short time ago, in consideration of his distinguished abilities, appointed Lieutenant-Governor of the north-west provinces—is about to retire from the latter important post.

We annex characteristic portraits of the murdered Rajah, Shere Sing; and of he Sirdar Ajeet Sing, the perpetrator of this bloody tragedy. Shere Sing was a fine, manly-looking fellow: he was a supposed son of the Maharaja, Runjeet Sing, the old lion of the Punjaub, though the latter strongly denied the paternity. he, however, granted him the privilege of a chair in his presence, an honour he shared with Kurruck Sing, the heir-apparent to the throne, and Heera Sing, the son of the minister, the only individuals of the court who were so distinguished. The Hon. W. G. Osborne, military secretary to the Governor General of India, in his very interesting account of the mission to Lahore, entitled, "The Court and Camp of Runjeet Sing," portrays Shere Sing as above: he was sent with Soochet Sing, by Runjeet, to conduct the embassy to their tents: "they were seated upon elephants, in golden howdahs, and escorted by about 500 of Runjeet's Goorcharras, or body-guards, splendidly dressed in chain-armour, and thick quilted jackets, made of rich silk, of all the colours of the rainbow." Shere Sing, in Runjeet's time, showed so much attention to Europeans, and such attachment to their manners and customs, as effectually to rouse his master's vigilance. Mr. Osborne then relates an anecdote of Shere Sing, which shows him to have been a man of superior sense. It appears that Runjeet, anxious that the deputation sent to meet the mission from the Governor-General, should do credit to his court, by the splendour of their dress and appearance, ordered them all to attend him in the morning. After complimenting Soochet Sing upon the beauty of his dress and jewels, he addressed Shere Sing, and asked the reason why he was without his usual magnificent ornaments; who replied, touching the hilt of his sword, "I am a soldier, and this is the only jewel I value." Runjeet angrily insisted upon knowing what had become of them, and at last elicited the truth from Shere Sing that they were in his own treasury, having been presented to him as a nuzzur, or complimentary gift, by Shere Sing, on the occasion of his paying him a friendly visit at his palace some months since. Runjeet pretended to be very much annoyed, and immediately offered to restore them; but Shere Sing, soldier as he was, was much too clever and polite to accept them! Shere Sing was in his 36th year. The Sirdar Ajeet Sing, the assassin of Shere Sing, also escorted the British mission to the presence of Runjeet, on the above occasion. It will be seen, by the news in a previous column, that on the morning after the murder, Ajeet was put to death, and his corpse treated with unknown ry skin to that which he had shown towards his own victim. [An accurate map of the Punjaub and Lahore, the scene of these frightful murders, will be found in the 9th number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.]

CHINA.

The Hong Kong Gazette publishes the detailed items of the tariff, established under the commercial treaty, and regulations for the conduct of our future intercourse with the Celestial empire.

Sir Henry Pottinger was making strenuous efforts for the early establishment of a regular system of government in our colony of Hong Kong.

The Bogue forts have all been rebuilt, larger and stronger than before, and are now ready. as yet no cannons have been put into them, but this will soon be done, and the new forts regularly garrisoned, when they will again assume the control of the river the same as before the late war. The inland trade now carried on at Whampoa must cease as soon as the new trade regulations come into operation. From Canton we learn nothing new except that a number of people are being raised to serve as soldiers, at the high pay of 4p. 6 per day. This has given occasion for many surmises among the native population, many of whom do not seem to think their Government sincere in their very friendly professions towards the English.

We are sorry to state that, according to accounts lately received, much sickness prevailed at Amoy. The cholera had broken out on board her Majesty's ship Wolverine, and three or four men, out of eighteen attacked, had died. The Wolverine had put to sea for a cruise. The garrison on shore also was sickly, and had changed many quarters

It is with much pleasure we give publicity to the following memorandum. The whole of the Hong merchants' debts have now been liquidated, not, however, without subjecting the richer of them to a great sacrifice in money, and Howqua, is said, from his own means, to have disbursed a great proportion of the money.

"MEMORANDUM.—Canton, July 23, 1843.—I do hereby declare a final dividend on the debts of the Hongs of Hingtae, Kingqua, and Mowqua, payable from the 24th to the 31st of July, 1843, both days inclusive, after which time all unpaid dividends will be sent to Hong Kong, at the expense and risk of the claimants.

"The creditors are again urgently requested to attend to the previous notices regarding the receipts and vouchers required to be furnished prior to the payment of the final dividend. "G. BALFOUR."

CHINESE CHARACTERS.

THE CHINESE TREATY AND TARIFF

The Gazette of Tuesday last contains the treaty between her Majesty and the Emperor of China, signed, in the English and Chinese languages, at Nanking, and ratified at Hong-Kong towards the close of last June. By article IV. the Emperor of China agrees to pay the sum of six million of dollars, as the value of the opium which was delivered up at Canton in the month of March, 1839, as a ransom for the lives of her Britannic Majesty's superintendent and subjects who had been imprisoned and threatened with death by the Chinese High Officers.

By Article VII., the total amount of the ransom is to be paid as follows:—Six millions immediately. Six millions in 1842; that is, three millions on or before the 30th of the month of June, and three millions on or before the 31st of December. Five millions in 1844; that is, two and a half millions on or before the 30th of June, and two and a half millions on or before the 31st of December. Four millions in 1845; that is, two millions on or before June 30, and two millions on or before December 31.

And it is further stipulated, that interest, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, shall be paid by the Government of China on any portion of the above sums that are not punctually discharged at the periods fixed

By Art. XI. it is agreed that Her Britannic Majesty's Chief High Officer in China shall correspond with the Chinese High Officers, both at the capital and in the provinces, under the term "communication;" the subordinate British Officers and Chinese High Officers in the provinces, under the terms "statement," on the part of the former, and on the part of the latter, "declaration:" and the subordinates of both countries on a footing of perfect equality, merchants and others (not holding official situations, and therefore not included in the above, on both sides, to use the term "representation:" in all papers addressed to, or intended for the notice of, the respective Governments.

It may be interesting, therefore, at the present moment to glance at the characters employed by the Chinese formerly and at present, which differ from each other very materially. For example:—Fig. 1 signified with the ancient Chinese a mountain or hill, which is now expressed by fig. 2. The sun was represented by a circle with a speck in the middle, as fig. 3; but now it is expressed by fig. 4. A dragon, as formerly depicted, is shown by fig. 5; but now by fig. 6. A sceptre, with one eye, as shown by fig. 7, signified formerly the King's name; which is now denoted by fig. 8. A bird, cock or hen, was formerly expressed in full shape and posture, as seen in figs. 9 and 11; but at present it is shown in figs. 10 and 12.

The Chinese also use certain lines and marks, which, however different in form, in some measure obscurely resemble the characters of the ancients, which represented the same things. We insert one of the figures marked with the letter M. Out of nine several lines or marks, the Chinese characters of these times are composed by adding or omitting one line or mark. For example—a straight line, as by the a on the left side of this print, signifies one, or the first; with a line drawn through it, as at b, denotes 10; and with a line underneath, as at c, it signifies earth; with another put over the downright line, as at d, it speaks king; with a point on the right side, as by e, it signifies a pearl; but such a point on the left side, as at f, signifies to live. Lastly, with a point upon the head of it, as at g, it signifies lord.

The original of this explanation is, we believe, in the museum of the East India Company

To the treaty is appended a list or tariff of duties on the foreign trade with China, established in pursuance of the tenth article of the treaty.

THE FRENCH IN ALGIERS.

A report of Marshal Bugeaud to the Minister of War, under date Algiers, 24th ult., completes the account of the military operations of the autumnal campaign. General Lamoricière writes on the 10th of October from Mascara, that on the 19th he marched from Ouizert towards the country of the Assessnas, in quest of Abd-el-Kader, who was encamped in the neighbourhood of Foufot. On reaching Ain Nezereg, he was informed that the Emir occupied a position near the springs of Sebdou, four leagues south east of Foufot. General Lamoricière accordingly proceeded in that direction, but when he arrived at Sebdou, after a forced march of seven leagues, he found that the enemy had abandoned his camp and marched in an unknown direction. On his return to Foufot, however, he learnt that Abd el-Kader had stopped at the marabout of Sidi Youssef, a distance of six leagues, and although his troops had marched upwards of eleven leagues on the preceding day, he set out at 3 o'clock the next morning to attack him. Colonel Morris, who commanded the advanced guard (composed of six squadrons of cavalry) having perceived some mounted videttes of the enemy stationed on a height within 1½ league of Sidi-Youssef, suddenly galloped off towards the marabout, doubting no longer of the existence of the camp in the neighbourhood. He moved on with greater rapidity, and, on attaining the summit of the hills, commanding a view of the small plain of Sidi Youssef, he discovered the troops of the Emir, consisting of a battalion and a half of infantry, and 500 or 600 cavalry, retreating towards a rocky and wooded rising ground, distant about a league and a half, which would have afforded him a secure retreat. Colonel Morris formed his column into squadrons and was about to charge the infantry, when 400 horsemen, commanded by Abd-el-Kader in person, faced round, and checked the advance of the French, who were for an instant thrown into confusion. Having rallied behind the 6th squadron, which was left in reserve, the colonel returned to the charge, and with the assistance of a battalion of the 13th Light Infantry, drove the enemy into the woods, where it would have been dangerous to follow him. The Emir lost in that encounter his Kalifa Abdel Bekri, Bouzian Ould Bedra, one of the chiefs of the Hachem Garabas, six officers of his regular cavalry, and 30 men killed, besides having a number of men wounded. The French had six privates and a sub-officer killed, one officer and 19 soldiers wounded, and five taken prisoners. Among the latter was a trumpeter, named Escoffier, who, during the retreat, dismounted and gave his horse to his captain, who had lost his in the mêlée. The Emir retired towards Berbour, and General Lamoricière now learned his steps to Ouizert to procure a supply of provisions, proceeded again in pursuit of him on the 20th. Two days afterwards, Abd-el-Kader effected a razzia against the Brahims, a tribe residing on the banks of the Mekerra, but was prevented from causing much mischief, by the approach of two battalions of the 15th Light Infantry. The Arab chief on this occasion narrowly escaped with his life. A horseman of the Beni-Amers, attached to the French column, boldly rode up to the Emir, took deliberate aim at him, but his gun missing fire, Abd-el-Kader shot him dead on the spot. The enemy, pursued during the greater part of the day, lost about 15 killed. General Lamoricière not deeming it possible to follow him through a ruined country, fell back on Ouizert, where he left the two battalions of the 15th in conservation, and re-entered Mascara on the 8th with the rest of his column. Colonel Cavaignac had chastised two small tribes inhabiting the mountains to the west of Temza, who had fired upon and harassed a French column passing through their territory. Those Arabs fought desperately in defence of their homes, and lost upwards of 80 killed.

ROME.—The Duke d'Aumale arrived in the port of Civita Vecchia on the 28th ult. The Apostolic Delegate of the Pope, and the chief authorities of the town, went a mile and a half out to meet him. The delegate went on board the Asmodee, and was at once received by his Royal Highness. The other persons were then presented to the Prince, who received them very graciously. He accepted the proposition to proceed on shore in the Pontifical boat, and to dine at the Apostolical Palace, which was placed at his disposal by his Holiness the Pope, in case he should like to sleep there. After dinner, the Prince set off for Rome, where he was expected at midnight.

SKETCHES OF SOUTH WALES.

VIEW OF SWANSEA.

The recent results of the special commission, and the still undiminished disorder and outrage in South Wales, render this an opportune moment for resuming our illustrations of the localities and characteristics of the country and its people, from sketches made by our artist, who has just returned from the disturbed districts.

Our first engraving represents Swansea, from the pier-head, showing the harbour, and the town mostly on the left. Between the hills on the right runs the Swansea river, past the Hafod copper and chemical works (engraved in No. 73 of our Journal), towards Neath. Aberavon and the Turback works are a little out of the picture to the right; the Mumbles, the western headland of the bay, to the left and the Llanelly road to the left of the town.

SWANSEA MARKET-WOMEN.

Swansea is situated on the right bank of the river Tawe, which falls into the Bristol Channel at Swansea Bay, close to the town. On the western pier there are a lighthouse and watch-house; and vessels of 300 tons are enabled to load and unload at the wharfs. On the north-east and north-west, the bay is backed by lofty hills, and the beach consists of an extensive level of firm sand. Swansea is the port of a rich mineral district; the principal branches of industry are the smelting of copper ore and the export of coal. Besides the works for smelting copper, there are iron foundries, yards for building and repairing ships, roperies, tanneries, breweries, and two potteries. The traffic with the country is facilitated by several canals and tramroads. The trade of the town has increased very rapidly during the present century, and Swansea is now a thriving place. It is much frequented for sea-bathing, and there is a communication by steam-boats with Bristol and Ilfracombe, and the Bristol and Liverpool steam-boats land and take up passengers from Swansea pier. There are two churches and above 15 chapels in the parish. The principal public buildings are the Philosophical Institution, the Infirmary, Theatre, House of Correction, Town-hall, Assembly-rooms, &c. The only remains of the ancient Castle are a massive square tower, which commands a fine view of the bay. Next are three characteristic groups of the peasant population. The Swansea market-women wear hats in shape between the hats of the time of Charles I., and those worn in England in the present day: they also wear the many-coloured shawl very gracefully, and in every variety of mode; yet numbers of these women are shoeless. Generally speaking, they are good-looking, and of elegant carriage: those portrayed in our engraving usually come to market on horseback, sitting between their baskets, and sometimes cross-legged.

The Carmarthenshire peasant women, as well as the women of South and North Wales generally, are remarkable for their fine figures: the girls carry water-pitchers and baskets on their heads, balancing them without holding; some of the pitchers have the classic forms of antiquity. The farmers usually ride to market on small horses, which are well-shaped, strong, and active creatures.

The "Rebeccaites," or "Beccas," in the 2nd group, are men disguised in women's large caps and hats, and having their faces blackened: sometimes they wear a woman's bed-gown, a sheet, or their own coat turned inside out; the more grotesque, the more complete the disguise. They also wear bunches of fern and feathers on their hats; and they carry guns, pick-axes, shovels, sledge-hammers, cow-horns, &c. With what dexterity, they use these weapons and implements, recent events have but too plainly shown. These several groups may be relied on for fidelity, having been sketched by our artist on the roadside.

The concluding illustration shows the town of Carmarthen, where are now sitting the special commissioners appointed by Government to investigate the grievances of the people, with a view to a legislative remedy. Carmarthen is a borough and county of itself, and is situate on the right or north-western bank of the river Towy, or Tywi, near where that river bends to the south to empty itself into Carmarthen Bay. The situation of the town is very beautiful, and the inequality of the ground on which it stands gives it a striking appearance when viewed from a distance. But the streets are irregular and steep, and many of them narrow: the principal streets, however, are well-paved, and lit with gas. The principal edifices are the Guildhall, in the centre of the town, and the County Gaol, occupying part of the site of the castle, on the brow of a hill and rising abruptly from the river. The church is a plain, large building, with a square tower. Sir Richard Steele lies buried here, but has no monumental record. There is a good market-place out of the town; and a substantial bridge of several arches over the Towy, by which the road from Swansea enters the town. There are no manufactures of any consequence at Carmarthen, except some iron and tin works in the neighbourhood, but the trade of the place is considerable, and there is a larger proportion than usual of wealthy persons among the shopkeepers and merchants. The quay extends along the banks of the Towy: the vessels which come here are chiefly coasters; the communication with Bristol is great, and vessels from 50 to 150 tons are built here. The town furnishes the populous district with which it is surrounded with various commodities: among the exports are timber, bark, marble, slates, lead ore, bricks, grain, butter, and eggs.

The special commissioners sit in a large room in the Guildhall, and, with their secretary, Mr. Gurney, the short-hand writer, and a clerk, there are usually six persons present at the examinations. The evidence given before the commissioners, and their report thereon, will be hereafter printed, and laid on the table of the House of Commons. Oppressive tolls, hatred of the New Poor-law, increased amount of tithes, high rents, unjust fees exacted by magistrates' clerks, and a perversion of justice, form the alternate and daily topics of complaint, before the commissioners.

A rumour is current that another special commission for the trial of the Carmarthenshire prisoners will be sent down after term into this country. It appears to have arisen from the fact of the county gaol being quite full of Rebecca prisoners, and from one of Mr. Maule, the Treasury solicitor's clerks, being in the town arranging the evidence against the prisoners.

In many parts of the county, the late verdict against the "Rebecca" prisoner Hughes, at Cardiff, has excited intense animosity against the jury who tried him. Some farmers from the more disturbed districts have affected even to be incredulous that such a verdict was ever returned by a Welsh jury. So far as an opinion can be formed at present, however, the severity of the sentence appears to have had a salutary effect, whilst it has at the same time excited commiseration for the culprit.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1843.

While we are endeavouring to gratify our readers with popular illustrations of the processions and pageantry of Lord Mayor's Day, we cannot allow the event of the change of mayoralty itself to pass without a few aspirations for the future, and comments upon the past.

Time was when the office of Lord Mayor was, with all its power and influence, little better than a gorgeous sinecure; the holder of which was often remarkable for such qualities of the head as we usually oppose to definitions of wisdom, while his office was sneered at on account of the small amount of administrative and moral dignity by which it was sustained. Of late years, however, some of the high functionaries of the City have, by the display of decision, energy, liberality, and enlightened purpose, greatly elevated the character of the mayoralty, and approximated it to what it ought to be—a power dispensing impartial justice and discretion in the magisterial representation of the first City of the World. And it is gratifying to be able to remark now, when the late Lord Mayor has seceded from his honourable vocation, that he, as much as anybody, has contributed to obtain respect and veneration for the civic chair. Although a strong politician, Alderman Humphery has conducted himself with perfect independence of party—his decisions have given universal satisfaction—he has much striven to preserve the integrity of trade, by attacking all systems of dishonesty that have been exposed before him—he has applied himself with unwearied assiduity to his magisterial duties—and as Mayor he has dispensed to all alike the most unbounded, liberal, and unsparing hospitality. He now leaves his mayoralty, followed by the best wishes of society, and covered with a good renown.

Nor while we are thus praising his conduct as a public servant, are we at all dissatisfied at the choice which the City has made of his successor. In selecting Alderman Magnay, the City vindicated a great public principle, by contrasting his personal respectability with the doubtful conduct of those whom they excepted, in raising him to his present dignity; and while we affirm our belief of his intelligence and enterprize, and of his anxious desire to do justice to the arduous duties of his high calling, we are paying him no ill compliment by the assertion that he cannot better achieve such honourable purpose than by emulating the conduct of his predecessor.

The contents of the Indian Mail are before the public, and our readers will not fail to be shocked at the perusal of the atrocities committed in the Punjaub—a district of India independent of the authority of the English Empire. There the sovereign of the "brief moment"—the "uncertain ruler with uncertain sway"—has been barbarously murdered by the agency of his own Prime Minister—his sons, their wives, and families have been butchered in cold-blood—finally treachery has been reacted upon, and the Minister himself has been sacrificed, with all the horrors of a barbarous vengeance—and, in a word, there is a literal picture of the worst passions revelling in all the wildness of their crime and cruelty, at which the heart sickens and Christianity turns pale. The dreadful scenes that have been enacted, however, are all of a piece with the terrors and duplicities of Indian treachery—the unscrupulous ambition and the mad revenge—which make the warriors of the soil barbarians expel honour from the bosoms of the people—and convert the throne into an altar of government, at which nobody can be for a single hour certain of the power or the presence of its priest. Kings are dethroned like children or puppets—save that their harmlessness of the event bears no proportion to the weakness of the monarch—for he is even dethroned in blood and his life, and perhaps the life of his family, is forfeited with his fragile sway. No doubt these occurrences are fearful in the extreme—this makes good men sigh for the depravity even of the barbarian—but with all the horror and indignation this excite, let them not (pray we) induce the British Government to hide the dust of conquest under the pretext of humanity. We have no business to interfere with the Punjaub on our own account. We may interpose the beautiful authority of civilization, and quench torrents of blood; but the arm of conquest must not be raised for British aggrandizement even where the prize is so large, so luring, and so rich. We have been induced to make this remark from a perusal of the report that a large effective army has been, by the foresight of Lord Ellenborough, brought to bear upon the frontiers of the Punjaub. It is well that such an army should be so stationed. It exhibits us armed at all points, and prepared for all emergencies; but let no tempting opportunity plunge us into a war of ambition instead of defence—of aggression instead of protection. We cannot with Christian honesty extend our dominions in the Punjaub as we have done in Scinde, and we hope for the honour of the country that the experiment will not be attempted.

We have seen with pleasure an announcement in the public papers that the authorities at the Horse Guards have instituted, or are about to institute, savings banks for the military in the different regiments. This is a gratifying announcement, and indicates the existence of some consideration for the permanent welfare of those whom we make our obedient and ready instruments in our schemes of natural aggrandizement or our precautions for self-defence. The soldiery of Great Britain has enclosed its security in a wall which no metallic or inanimate substance could equal in strength and efficiency; and while we enjoy the advantage of their prowess, we should gladly avail ourselves of opportunities to provide for their well-being. To introduce amongst them habits of providence, by affording them facilities and temptations to the exercise of such a disposition, will not only confer on them a favour which they well deserve, as well as tend to raise their character and morals, but will afford increased inducement to enlist in the service to men of a higher and more reputable class than that from which in some instances it is supplied, by exhibiting to the public many instances of successful prudence and foresight, whereby the soldier has been enabled, in addition to his pay, to lay by for himself a decent competence for his declining years.

It is well known that the exercise of a little prudence, and a perception of the advantages it affords, generally confirms the habit, and when a soldier has found that he has already saved a small sum beyond his daily wants, the recklessness with which he now squanders his little pittance, in the presumption, that, act as he may, he will never soar beyond the capability of satisfying urgent necessities, will be soon abandoned, and increased thriftiness and increased moral control will supervene. The measure will very much tend also to produce greater contentment in the army. There is a very natural feeling amongst men who encounter so many perils, and undergo so many fatigues at the bidding of others—who themselves confront no danger, and suffer no fatigue—that they are used as the blind instruments of an unfeeling directing power, that urges their motions and combinations with the indifference of a chess-player. It is wise, therefore, to afford them some evidence of a paternal feeling on the part of the Executive. By such means they will perform their duties with alacrity, and be fortified by their attachment to the Government of their country against any temptations which in any part of the empire may be addressed to them to forget their yet untarnished loyalty. In Ireland and in England they possibly may have to listen to the voice of the tempter, and suggestions of peculiar unrequited hardship, and appeals to general sympathy and misrepresented patriotism, may be insinuated in their ears, but their consciousness that they are serving a protecting Government and an appreciating country, will render them unimpressible by such attacks, and make them aspire to be the decus as well as the tutemen of our institutions. Their loyalty will be no longer unreasoning, and their obedience merely instinctive, but a strong sense of moral duty and obligations of gratitude will quicken the impulse which leads them to their country's service, and render them incorruptible at home, as abroad they are invincible.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—This morning her Majesty, the ladies and gentlemen of the royal suite, and the household, attended divine service in the private chapel in the Castle. A very eloquent and able discourse was delivered by the Hon and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay, who officiated. The rev. gentleman took his text from the 14th chapter of St. John, and the 2nd and 3rd verses.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Charlotte Dundas, and Sir George Couper attended divine service in the parish church. The Rev. Mr. Gossett officiated

Her Majesty and her illustrious Consort enjoyed their accustomed early walk in the forenoon.

The Duke of Cambridge passed the forenoon of Saturday shooting in Richmond Park. His Royal Highness honoured Mr. Lyne Stephens with his company at dinner in the evening, at his residence at Southampton.

Sir James and Lady Graham left town on Saturday on a visit to the Queen, at Windsor Castle.

MONDAY.—At half-past twelve o'clock her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert took equestrian exercise in the Riding School. Colonel Buckley and Colonel Wyse were in attendance.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge arrived at the Castle at half-past five o'clock from Kew, on a visit to her Majesty. His Royal Highness was attended by Baron Knesebeck.

The following distinguished personages have also arrived on a visit to her Majesty:—His Serene Highness Le Prince d'Oettingen Wallenstein, the Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby, and Viscount Combermere. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty at the Castle. The Earl of Aberdeen went to town in the morning, and returned to the Castle to dinner. Her Majesty gave a grand dinner party.

TUESDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert did not take their usual morning walk, in consequence of the unfavourable state of the weather. The Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby left the Castle this morning, in consequence of the intelligence received of the melancholy demise of the Hon. Edward Ernest Villiers, brother to the Earl of Clarendon. Mr. Patrick Fyfer, the Scottish historian, arrived at the Castle, on a visit to her Majesty.

WEDNESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert took their usual walking exercise in the vicinity of the Castle, both in the morning and afternoon. Her Serene Highness the Princess of Hohenlohe Langenbourg accompanied the Royal pair in the forenoon. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge took leave of her Majesty and her illustrious consort, and left the Court, attended by Baron Knesebeck. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester also took leave of the Queen, and took her departure, attended by Lady G. Bathurst. Le Prince de Oettingen Wallenstein quitted the Castle for the Clarendon Hotel, London. His Excellency Baron de Cetto, Bavarian Minister, took his departure for his own official residence in Hill-street. Viscount Combermere also left.

MARRIAGE OF HIS MAJESTY THE EMPEROR OF BRAZIL.—This happy event took place on the 4th September last, at Rio de Janeiro, the Brazilian Neapolitan squadron having arrived the day before from Naples. Rio de Janeiro was very gay on the occasion, for having been for some time looked for, almost all the respectable people in the empire had congregated to partake in the festivities and general rejoicing. The city was illuminated at night, and fireworks—both very brilliant—resounded through and bespangled the sky. Her Majesty's brother accompanied his sister, and the Princess Januaria the Emperor her brother. People began to speculate on another princely wedding taking place.

On Sunday last his Royal Highness Prince Alexander of the Netherlands left Mivart's Hotel, attended by Baron Sloet, for Buckwell, and there embarked for Rotterdam, on his return to the Court of Holland at the Hague, after a protracted sojourn in this country of more than three months, which his Royal Highness greatly passed in Scotland. The farewell visits of the nobility to the Prince at Mivart's, prior to his departure, were exceedingly numerous.

THE QUEEN DOWAGER. WILTEY COURT.—Sir Robert and Lady Peel arrived on a visit to the Queen Dowager on Monday last from Drayton Manor, Staffordshire. Her Majesty continues in the enjoyment of uninterrupted health and spirits.

The Earl of Cardigan arrived in Portman-square on Friday, from the Cavalry Barracks, Dublin. The Countess has also arrived in town from the Bohemian Spas, where her ladyship has been passing the season for the improvement of her health.

Sir Robert Peel and several of the cabinet ministers arrived in town on Thursday to attend the grand banquet at Guildhall.

The Earl of Bective, eldest son of the Marquis of Headfort, attained his majority on the 1st instant, when the event was celebrated by rejoicings on the estates of the noble marquis in Meath. The noble lord married during his minority the accomplished daughter of Mr. Alderman Thompson, M.P.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Bordeaux, who had intended to visit London about the 10th inst., has deferred his journey for some weeks, in consequence of the expected arrival of the Duke and Duchess de Nemours. His Royal Highness will take advantage of this circumstance to visit some of our manufacturing towns, making excursions from Alton Towers, the seat of the Earl of Shrewsbury, which will, for the present, continue his head-quarters.

DEATH OF COLONEL SHAW.—It is our painful duty to announce the death of Col. Merrick Shaw, which took place a few days ago, at Kingstown, near Dublin. The gallant colonel had long enjoyed the confidence and society of the late Marquis Wellesley, whom he served in the capacity of private secretary, while that nobleman filled the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, attended by Baron Knesebeck, arrived in town on Wednesday afternoon, from a visit to the Queen at Windsor Castle. His Royal Highness travelled to town by the Great Western Railway, and most likely proceeded to Cambridge House, where his Royal Highness arrived at five o'clock

Sir Robert and Lady Peel returned to their residence, in Whitehall gardens, on Wednesday evening, from a visit to her Majesty the QUEEN Dowager, at Wiley Court.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

CORPORATION OF THE SONS OF THE CLERGY AND THE INCORPORATED CLERGY SOCIETY.—A general meeting of the members of the above Corporation was held on Thursday last at the office, Bloomsbury place. Sir Robert H. Inglis, Bart. M.P. in the chair. Inside shows were opened three distinct charities for the benefit of the indigent clergy, their widows, and their children. The benefits to be derived from them are in no respect confined to the inhabitants of London or its neighbourhood, but are equally extended to all parts of the kingdom, characteristic of national charities. The Corporation was established by charter, in the year 1678. His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury is the President. The revenues are distributed in pensions and benefactions to the widows of necessitous clergymen, and to maiden daughters of deceased clergymen, whose ages exceed forty-five years—in benefactions given about Christmas annually to curates with small incomes, and to poor clergymen with large families in apprenticing the children of poor clergymen, and assisting some of them to settle in business—in rendering relief to cases of urgent distress amongst the clergy and their families. The second department of the Corporation, the Clergy Orphans Society, was first formed in the year 1749, and incorporated in 1806, for clothing, maintaining and educating the orphans of clergymen. It is under the patronage of Her Majesty and the Queen Dowager, and the presidency of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and is supported by benefactions and annual subscriptions. The number of children on the establishment has gradually increased from 80 to 130. The funds having also proportionately increased, more than 1000 orphans among from all parts of England and Wales have been educated in the schools since the foundation; and by the aid of the two former charities, most of these orphans have been placed out as apprentices to respectable employments, &c., and have thus been provided with the means of becoming serviceable to themselves and the community. A special fund for the latter purpose was established in the year 1826, under the management of the governors and committee. The report detailed at some length, other matters connected with the charities. After the appointment of committees, governors and other officers, &c., a vote thanks was passed to the chairman, and the meeting separated.

THE BUST OF ESPARTERO.—Mr. Jones, of Cannon-row, Westminster, a gentleman long celebrated as a [illegible] general talent and intelligence, and with high reputation as a civil engineer, has directed his genius towards the poetical art of sculpture, and with an early and unprecedented success which must much encourage him to future effort—has succeeded in obtaining a perfect and beautiful bust of Espartero, which, for fidelity of contour, general expression, and true delicacy of execution, is the admiration of all who regard it as a work of art

LICENSED VICTUALLERS' ASYLUM.—On Wednesday a special general court of the members of this excellent society was held at the Asylum, Kent-road, for the purpose of electing occupants for the four vacant houses in the Institution for the widows, and the trade in general, are well acquainted with the importance and value of this truly laudable institution, that it is almost an act of supererogation to say one word in its behalf. It certainly ranks amongst the most unexceptionable of the metropolitan charities. We regret, however, to observe by the speech of the chairman on the occasion, that a most scandalous violation of all propriety and decency occurred on the part of certain Police Inspectors, who personally canvassed the members of the trade on behalf of their favourite candidates evidently holding out their official prerogatives as terrorem over those who might have the hardihood to resist their solicitations. Everybody knows the excessive annoyance which Police Inspectors may inflict on tavern keepers if they feel so disposed, and therefore the public should regard with great jealousy any such interference as this, which, for all that is known to the contrary may be exercised in the election of Members of Parliament, as well as of inmates of a charitable institution.

SUDDEN DEATH OF MR. GADSDEN, THE PRINTER.—On Saturday afternoon Mr. Gadsden, late of St. Martin's-lane, but since residing near Gray's-inn-lane, on returning from his solicitor's, in Charterhouse-square, was proceeding to Newgate-street, when on reaching the corner of Panyer-alley, leading to Paternoster-row, he suddenly fell to the ground. Several persons who were passing immediately raised him up, and a medical man was brought to him; his aid, however, was useless, for life was extinct.

ELECTION OF CHURCH OFFICERS IN ALDERMANBURY.—A meeting of the vestrymen of the parish of St. Stephen, Walbrook (adjourned from the 26th of October), was held on Wednesday morning. Considerable curiosity was excited in consequence of the vestry having predetermined to adjourn for a month or five weeks, in order to give Alderman Gibbs the legal time to produce his full accounts, in accordance with a bill which was put on the file of Chancery last week. The chairman was not in attendance, and, after a warm discussion, the vestry adopted the following resolution:—"That a vote of censure is hereby given to the churchwarden, Alderman Gibbs, for his concealment of the affairs of the parish of St. Stephen, Walbrook; and the parishioners hereby express their want of confidence in him, and their determination to use all legal means to repossess themselves of all books, papers, &c., in his possession, relating to the said property, with a view to the future letter maintenance thereof

THE LONDON COMPOSITORS.—We exceedingly regret to observe that, notwithstanding the immense number of newspapers, periodicals, and publications of all sorts, which issue from the London press, a great many compositors are out of employment, and consequently in a state of great destitution and distress. This is a class of men who certainly deserve well of society; but such is the unfortunate, but too true, result of the combinations which have sprung up in connexion with the printing trade. Think of what we must and you may suffer, before you have to ask for work. have done. If you will have us desperate, and live again like honest men, by the blessing of God you may expect to prosper, and we [illegible] have to thank you for the mercy of the Crown for on no other terms than your good conduct will any pity be shown to us, or others who may [illegible] into our almost hopeless situation.

Signed) I. IN H[illegible]

"The mark X of JOHN HUGH.

"Cardiff Gaol, Nov. 1, 1843. Witness, JOHN B. WOODS, Governor.

We regret to say, that notwithstanding the special commission, and the commission of inquiry, which it was thought would have subdued the reckless and have given hope of alleviation to the distressed, the work of toll-gate demolition still goes on, regardless of consequences, to the great disappointment and mortification of those who are the most interested in the welfare of the Welsh people. Last week the toll-gates at Pontmawr, Newbridge, and Rhaydar, in Radnorshire, were demolished under circumstances which evince the determination of these lawless depredators to persist in the course which they have so successfully began.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The Admiralty have permitted Mr. Blake, the builder, of Portsmouth Dockyard, and Messrs Cavasse, and other gentlemen, who were educated in the School of Naval Architecture, to build a brig each, of 450 tons displacement, with masts and spars of the same size as the brig now building by Sir W. Symonds, Messrs. White, &c.

SAVINGS' BANKS FOR THE ARMY.—A War Office circular and warrant for establishing and regulating regimental savings' banks has just been issued, with forms showing the manner in which the several books are to be kept, and of a certificate to be signed by the officer commanding, the officer second in command, and the adjutant, which is to be transmitted to the Secretary-at-War after each of the quarters ending the 30th June, 30th September, 31st December, and 31st March.

A new traversing platform, on which a 32-pounder gun and carriage was mounted, was tried on Saturday last, in the Marshes, at Woolwich, in presence of a number of officers of the Royal Engineers. Two men can move it, with the heavy gun and carriage, in a less space of time than could move a piece of ordnance with its carriage on the ordinary platform and bring the gun to her range with far greater ease and certainty. It cannot fail to be hailed with great pleasure by the artillery service, as the result of the experiment was of a favourable nature

THIRD BATTALION OF GRENADIER GUARDS.—This battalion, which is stationed at the Infantry Barracks, Sheet-street, Windsor, had its half-yearly muster, in the barrack yard, on Saturday morning last, when the whole of the officers, including his Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, were present. After the muster, Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, Lieutenant-Colonel Baldero, and Lieutenant-Colonel Mackenzie, who had been absent on leave, took their departure. Lieutenant-Colonel Thornton, Captain Cartwright, and Lieutenant the Hon. Mortimer West, have joined from leave; and Lieutenant-Colonel Eyres, Captain the Hon. A. Gough, and Lieutenant Lloyd, have left on temporary leave

SALE OF HMS. OF WAR.—On Tuesday afternoon 10 of Her Majesty's ships of war, condemned by the Admiralty surveyor, were put up for sale by Dutch auction at the Admiralty office, Somerset-house. The sale attracted a considerable number of gentlemen connected with the shipping interest, but there was very little competition. The Commissioners present were,—Sir F. Seymour, Sir W. Symonds, the Hon. R. Corne, and Captain Chatfield. The conditions of sale under "Dutch auction" are very simple. The lot is offered at an upset price; and, if no offer, abatements are made of 40*l.* at a time, until accepted, or the commencement price without reduction will be allowed. In the latter case, the lot is withdrawn. The lots were offered at the following order, the crier announcing the upset price of each ship respectively:—Charybdis, brigantine, 238 tons, lying at Sheerness, 40*l.*, abated to 20*l.*; not sold. Brisk, brigantine, 236 tons, lying at Sheerness, 41,100*l.*, abated to 40*l.* at which it was cleared. Jaseur, 16 guns, 397 tons, lying at Portsmouth, 41,000*l.* abated to 40*l.*; not sold. Forester, 19 guns, 385 tons, lying at Plymouth, 41,000*l.*, abated to 40*l.*; not sold. Buzzard, 10 guns, 231 tons, lying at Plymouth, 41,000*l.* abated to 40*l.*, at which it was cleared. Lyra, 10 guns, 226 tons, lying at Plymouth, 41,000*l.*, abated to 40*l.*; not sold. Sesarina, 43 guns, 844 tons, lying at Plymouth, 42,500*l.*, abated to 42,340*l.*; not sold. Mosquito, 6 guns, 304 tons, lying at Plymouth, 41,000*l.* abated to 40*l.*, at which it was cleared. Levere, 19 guns, 537 tons, lying at Sheerness, 41,000*l.*, abated to 40*l.*, at which it was cleared. Bloodhound, 6 guns, 305 tons, lying at Plymouth, 42,000*l.*, abated to 42,000*l.*; not sold. The sale having closed, Captain Gordon said, that as there were only four ships sold, the commissioners would hereafter reserve any farther for the remaining vessels by private contract, but to prevent mistakes such trader had better be made by letter. The purchasers, who are all natives of Plymouth, made the requisite deposits, and the sale terminated. The average price of the vessels sold did not exceed 5*s.* per ton, according to register, which was considered exceedingly low, considering the construction of the old gun brigs, the class to which they chiefly belong.

PRIZE MONEY.—The prize money granted to the Acorn for the capture of the noted slaver Gabriel, on the 6th of July, 1841, will be paid to the late officers and crew of the sloop on and after Friday, the 10th inst., in the following proportions:—Commander, 23*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.*; first class, 27*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.*; second, 25*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.*; third, 23*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.*; fourth, 21*l.* 9*s.* 0*d.*; fifth, 20*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.*; sixth, 20*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.*; seventh, 20*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* The lucky Acorn has many more prizes to share as valuable as this.

The commanding officer of the Medina, it appears, passed, on his passage into Kingstown harbour a few days since, a vessel, supposed to be a brig, which had recently sunk, about half a mile E. of the Kish light vessel, in four fathoms water, her masts being then visible, with topgallant yards across. She lies in the direct track for vessels bound into Kingstown Harbour or up to Dublin

COUNTRY NEWS.

DESIGNED TO INCENDIARISM.—On Wednesday night last the cut [illegible] to thirteen farm-houses in Denbighshire, were destroyed by an incendiary. In this extensive conflagration one man lost his life, and seven men head of cattle, in addition to a large quantity of farm produce, were destroyed The causes were assembled from nine miles from Denbigh, the village of Llan gwm and Cerrig-y-Drudion. The sufferers were all related to each other. A hour frost having fallen, the track of the incendiary's feet was distinctly visible and he was easily traced from one place to another. Several individuals followed the trail to Tyn-y-Celn, where it disappeared in an outhouse. Search was made, but the fugitive could not be found. The track was again discovered in the morning, but the scent could not be found. The track was again discovered in the morning, but the scent could not be found. LORD MAYOR'S DAY.

Oh! such a day
So renown'd and victorious,
Sure such a day was never seen—
City so gay,
And Cits so uproarious,
As tho' such sight had never been!

All hail! November—
Though no hail to-day
(At least that we remember,)
Hath pav'd the way
His Civic Majesty hath will'd to go,
And swore he'd go it 'spite hail, rain, or snow!
He takes to water for an airing,
Before perhaps he dines with Baring
Or sees the waiter, so alert
Place the fav'rite Patties-on
The table near him—knave expert
To make the most of "what is on!"
By this we mean, what's most in season,
To say no more we have a reason!

All hail! November!
Who is it that doth call thee gloomy?
None but the physical and rheumy
A centfold worth December
Art thou—although Antipodes
Thy morning, noon, and evening hours
Appear unto the smiling Mays,
That are one garland of sweet flow'rs!

But hold! Avaunt with pastoral,
Dear festive month.
For thirty times I can recall
(Would that it were the hundredth-ONE!)
The joys of Civic hall
"Where beard-wag all,"
And tightest corporations feel
Expanded by the generous meal
Shewn for turtle—venison—pheasant,
And every other good thing present.

Would that thy day could ever last,
Or each be brighter than the past,
Or that all life could be compress'd
Into one long interminable feast,
Like this to day,
Thou glorious Ninth November!
Which, till next year,
I'll cease not to remember! ALD. APICIUS.

Since the first Mayoralty procession, in the year 1215, probably, there have been few finer days for the pageant, than Thursday last, when the November sun even gilded with his beams the somewhat tarnished splendour of the City state. The business of the day accordingly brought out considerable crowds of gazers; and notwithstanding the Report of the Committee on Corporation Reform, presented but two or three days previously, all classes, freemen and non-freemen, took the liberty of feasting their eyes and hearts upon the procession by land and water

On Wednesday, according to annual custom, the new Lord Mayor was sworn into his office of Chief Magistrate of the City of London, at Guildhall.

Alderman Magnay, being a member of the Stationers' Company, the master, wardens, and court of assistants of that company complimented him with a breakfast at Stationers' hall, Ludgate-hill, shortly before nine o'clock, to which gentlemen, headed by one of the city marshals, set out in procession to the Mansion-house, where they were met by the new Lord Mayor elect. After having partaken of an elegant and recherché repast, déjeuner à-la-fourchette, the whole of the company quitted the Mansion-house and proceeded to the Guildhall, where they arrived a quarter before three. The [illegible] the Lord Mayor elect, [illegible] the usual day. There was also a considerable number of [illegible] ladies to witness the ceremony, who were all accommodated [illegible] the right and left of the chair which Alderman Humphery, the returning Lord Mayor, occupied. Upon taking the chair, Lord Mayor Humphery, in a very good humoured manner, said to Alderman Magnay, "I have the pleasure, sir, [illegible] to-day." Alderman Magnay was then duly sworn in Lord Mayor for the year ensuing, with the usual formalities. Alderman Humphery then took the oaths of office as President of the Irish Society. In the evening the master, wardens, and court of assistants of the Stationer's Company, dined at the Mansion-house, upon the special invitation of the new Lord Mayor.

On Thursday morning, at 11 o'clock, the various officials assembled at the Guildhall, and, the procession being formed, proceeded thence through King-street, Cateaton-street, Moorgate-street, London Wall, Broad-street, Threadneedle-street, Mansion House-street, Poultry, Cheapside, and Queen-street, to Southwark-bridge, where his lordship embarked at the Floating Pier for Westminster. This somewhat unusual arrangement arose from the new Lord Mayor being the Alderman of Vintry Ward, wherein the bridge is situated, and his lordship being desirous that his constituents should witness the progress of the civic procession. The embarkation is depicted upon the front page of our present number, where the Lord Mayor's state barge, the watermen in their characteristic costume, and the Lord Mayor and his party are, in civic phrase, "taking water." We term this an "unusual" arrangement; but it will doubtless be recollected that last year Alderman Humphery, to gratify his constituents in Southwark, passed over London Bridge, and "took water" on the Surrey side.

The novelty of the point of embarkation on Thursday, drew clustering crowds upon the bridge and the adjoining river banks. There were the usual water-side rejoicings—as the firing of guns, streaming flags, and hearty cheers; and the water procession had all the festal gaiety which is from week to week pictured upon the head and front of our journal. At the moment of the arrival of the procession at Southwark Bridge—a quarter-past one—the scene was very animating, the river being thickly covered with boats of various descriptions, as well as with no less than seven state barges, filled inside and outside with the Livery belonging to the City companies, and all anxiously awaiting the word of command to proceed onward to Westminster. The sun shone resplendently upon the flags and banners studding the tops of the barges, and the wharfs near the spot all exhibited similar emblems. At half-past one the new Lord Mayor entered the City barge, and was no sooner recognised than the air was rent with the most [illegible] shouts of approval, which he [illegible] acknowledged repeatedly bowing to the assembled multitude. The aquatic procession now left the pier, the City state barge leading, and the Stationers, Fishmongers, Goldsmiths, Wax Chandlers, and Ironmongers' Companies, in their respective state barges.

The following was the Order of Procession:—

Police Constables to clear the way.
The Boys belonging to the Royal Marine Society, with Banners.
City Marshal's Men.
Six Police Constables.

The Lord Mayor and civic authorities arrived at Westminster shortly after two o'clock, and having landed, walked in procession to the Court of Exchequer—the large number of Peeresses and gentlemen awaited his arrival. Having been introduced to the Chief Baron by the Recorder, who briefly stated the qualifications of Alderman Magnay for his important office of chief magistrate, and the learned Baron having eloquently replied, the new Lord Mayor invited his lordship to the inauguration dinner, and afterwards proceeded to the other Courts, inviting the Judge of each court to the same.

His lordship and the various officials then re-embarked in the state barge, and arrived at Blackfriars-bridge shortly after three o'clock, where the procession was re-formed, which passed through New Bridge-street to the Obelisk, where they were joined by the Ambassadors, her Majesty's Ministers, the Nobility, Judges, Members of Parliament, and various other persons of distinction. The whole then moved through Ludgate Hill, St. Paul's Church-yard, Cheapside, and down King-street to Guildhall, where the inaugural entertainment was to be given.

THE BANQUET.

The Guildhall was splendidly lighted up—every one and with the addition of wax candelabras, escutcheons, trophies of arms, and other decorations, presented a most brilliant appearance. About five o'clock the guests began to assemble in considerable numbers, though the dinner was not ordered till much past six. The more distinguished persons visited each other, and renewed their acquaintance, and some of them, as they passed through the Hall, received the customary tribute of applause. The Lord Mayor and the late Lord Mayor were loudly cheered. A warm mark of approbation followed the announcement of the name of Sir Robert Peel.

Soon after six o'clock the Lord Mayor took the chair. Amongst the principal guests we observed the late Lord Mayor, the Lord Chancellor, Sir E. Sugden, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir J. Graham, Sir E. Knatchbull, Mr. Sheriff Musgrove, the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, the Marquis of Salisbury, the Earl of Lincoln, Sir G. Murray, and a number of members of Parliament, besides judges, foreign ambassadors, &c., &c.

The dinner and wines were both excellent, the material of the entertainment being rather superior to most of its predecessors, a circumstance which was remarked, as a favourable omen of the liberal spirit by which it is understood the present mayoralty, in imitation of that immediately preceding it, is to be distinguished.

The cloth having been removed, and "Non Nobis Domine" sung, and Mr. Toole, the toast-master, having given the "Hearty welcome" in the most unapproachable style,

The Lord Mayor rose to propose the first toast, but, from the position of the reporters, he was scarcely audible. He said, the first toast which it was his duty and honour to propose, was that of "The health of her Majesty Queen Victoria," and, as she reigned in the hearts and affections of all her subjects, he was sure the toast required no other recommendation. (Loud cheers.)

The toast was drunk with the usual loyal honours, and was followed by "God save the Queen.

The Lord Mayor next proposed, in succession, the healths of the Queen Dowager, Prince Albert, the Army and Navy, the Duke of Wellington, and the Forces.

The Swedish Minister briefly returned thanks, but was wholly inaudible.

The Lord Mayor then said that it was with the highest gratification that he rose to propose "The health of Sir Robert Peel and of her Majesty's Ministers." (Loud cheering.) When her Majesty had called her present Ministers to her councils this country was engaged in war, the results of which might have been fraught with much evil to the people of this country. (Cheers.) Those wars were now brought to an honourable termination; our Indian empire had been consolidated, and prospects of great commercial advantage had been opened to us in relation to China. It was also but just to state that under the auspices of the present Ministry a great improvement had taken place in our finances; there had, indeed, at no time since that before her late Majesty's Ministers would have the pride and satisfaction of congratulating themselves on the termination of a state of financial derangement which had produced much public anxiety and distress. For their exercise they would receive the only fitting reward, that regard and respect which this country was always ready to pay to exalted merit and virtue. (Cheers.)

The toast was drunk with loud applause.

Sir Robert Peel, on rising, was loudly cheered. He said, my Lord Mayor, ladies, and gentlemen—I have great satisfaction in appearing here from a distant part of the country, for the purpose of meeting my fellow-countrymen in this hall on this auspicious occasion. I say my fellow-citizens, because I have the honour of being a member of one of the most distinguished communities of this great corporation, and I have just the same pride in my connexion with the Guild or Fraternity of the freedom of the City of London. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I have also attended here for the purpose of discharging in person that duty which now devolves upon me, of thanking you, in the name of her Majesty's Government, their respect for the City of London, and of returning your grateful acknowledgments for the compliment you have just paid them in so flattering manner; and of assuring you that none can be more proud of receiving testimonies to them to persevere in the discharge of their duty to the Sovereign and to their country, than the hope of acquiring in return your good opinion (Loud cheering.) Gentlemen, in this happy country, in which our lives have been passed, there have grown up, coeval with the monarchy, various institutions which have served, when occasion required, as checks upon the abuse of power on the defences of public liberty, and which now constitute powerful and efficient instrument of good and peaceful government. Of our old institutions there is none more remarkable for its venerable antiquity, for its admirable provisions, for its high character, for the influence which it has exercised in the history of this country, than the City of London in its corporate capacity; and it is of the utmost importance, for the well-being of this metropolis, and for the general interest of the community, that there should exist between the servants of the Crown and the [illegible] of municipal authorities of the City of London, that good understanding, and that cordial concurrence and co-operation, upon public questions, which can co-exist with great differences of political opinion. Scarcely any passes in the course of which it is not necessary that there should be between the servants of the Crown and the chief civil officers of this great community frequent intercourse on matters relating to the public tranquillity on matters relating to the comfort and convenience of the inhabitants of this, the greatest City of the habitable globe—on matters which are every day occupying and which are wholly engrossing more of our attention—I mean the ample allotment and the ornaments of this great metropolis. I speak not of embellishment for the mere purpose of ornament, but of those points in the which shall conduce to the public health, to the facilities of intercourse, and to the support of commercial communication. These are matters of the utmost importance, and it is necessary, in relation to them, that cordial communication should take place, which cannot take place with good effect unless there be that good understanding to which I have referred, and which is perfectly compatible with [illegible] upon the conclusion of his year of office, has some testimony of public approbation which, though differing in politics with the late [illegible] yor, I am proud to pay him. (Cheers). I hope I am confident that he will be distinguished for the same fidelity of access, for the same impartiality in the administration of public justice, for the same oblivion of party feeling and of party interests, when they come athwart the performance of public duties (Hear). Allow me also to express a confident hope that he also will be distinguished for that generous and comprehensive hospitality when derives its chief recommendation, not from ostentatious display, but from the kind and generous spirit by which it is animated and directed. I hope, therefore, gentlemen, that you will accept with enthusiasm the toast which I conclude with giving—"The health of the late Lord Mayor." (Cheers.)

The toast having been drunk with great applause,

Mr. Alderman Humphery returned thanks, but, we regret to say, was but imperfectly audible. He said how any man might be proud that his health had been proposed and received in so distinguished a manner. He had hardly words—indeed, he had not words—to express the feelings and sentiments of his heart which they desired to correct. From the bottom of his heart he thanked them for the great cordiality which they had evinced towards him. (Loud cheers.)

The Lord Mayor then proposed "The health of the Lord Chancellor," whose great talents and the manner in which he had discharged the duties of his high office, had justly gained him the respect of the country at large. (Cheers.

The Lord Chancellor returned thanks; but very little of what fell from his lordship was audible. It was impossible (he said) not to be highly gratified at the manner in which his health had been proposed and received in an assembly so large, and composed of so much that was eminent for wealth, talent, respectability, and character. He had always the greatest pleasure in meeting the citizens of London, with whom the body on which he had the honour to belong had always been united in close connexion. After a warm eulogium on the conduct of the late Lord Mayor, his Lordship added that, from the excellent nature and admirable qualities of his hon. friend, who succeeded the chief magistracy of the City, and to imitate, as far as possible, the bright example which had been set him by his immediate predecessor. (Cheers)

"The health of the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Judges of England," was next drunk, which was acknowledged by Lord Chief Justice Tindal.

"Mr. Masterman, and the Members for the City of London," responded to by Mr. Masterman, and subsequently by Mr. Pattison.

"The Attorney-General and the Bar of England."

The Attorney-General returned thanks.

"The Recorder," "The Sheriffs," and "Prosperity to the City of London," followed; but with respect to the last mentioned toast, it may be observed that, as is customary, not one word [illegible] shall fall either from the chair or responded was heard at the reporters' table. Indeed, the only speaker who could be distinctly heard was Sir Robert Peel.

After these toasts the greater part of the company retired, and the [illegible] mally broke up.

The following splendid bill of fare will testify the care which has been taken by the committee to provide a banquet that shall do honour to the first city in the world:—

GENERAL BILL OF FARE [illegible] (each), 200 bottles of sherbet, [illegible], 60 roast pullets, 60 dishes of fowls, 48 ditto of capons, 12 French pies, 24 [illegible] (each), 200 ornamented), 43 tongues, 2 quarters of house lamb, [illegible] (each), 12 [illegible] rumps of beef, 12 sirloins, rumps, and ribs of [illegible] sparagus, 60 ditto of mashed and other potatoes, 44 ditto of shell fish, [illegible] jellies, 30 blancmanges, 40 dishes of tarts (ornamented), 30 dishes of orange [illegible], 10 ditto of almond pastry, 20 Chantilly baskets, 60 dishes of minced pies.

THE REMOVES.—80 roast turkeys, 6 leverets, 80 pheasants, 24 geese, 40 dishes of partridges, 15 Lakes of wild fowl, 2 pea fowls.

DESSERT.—100 pine apples, from two to three pounds each, 200 dishes of hothouse grapes, 6 ice-creams, 80 dishes of apples, 100 dishes of pears, 60 ornamented Savoy cakes, 3 plates of walnuts, 80 ditto of dried fruit and preserves, 80 ditto of preserved ginger, 60 ditto of nest cakes and chips, 40 ditto of brandied [illegible].

WINES.—Champagne, Hock, Madeira, Sherry, Port, Claret.

THE PROCESSION.

Our illustrations of the pageant of last year (see No. 27 of our journal) were the Inauguration at Guildhall, the Water Procession, the Arrival at Westminster Hall, the Return, and the Banquet in Guildhall. We have, this year, chosen different points—as the Embarkation at Southwark-bridge, already referred to, and the Return of the Procession, just as the gorgeous state coach has reached the Obelisk, at New Bridge-street, and is about to wend its way up Ludgate-hill. The coach is, doubtless, the most imposing feature of the modern show, and has been played its part for upwards of seventy years and ten. It is a piece of cumbrous magnificence, better assorting with the leisurely progress of other days than the notions of these railway times. Yet it is a goodly sight, which may have inspired many civic apprentices, and some grown-men also, with a desire for an honourable mayoralty of the land: it is, moreover, the very type of this "red-letter day" in the City; and, costly as it is, with its disappearance, even portly aldermen will regret its absence.

The foremost group in our engraving shows the Lord Mayor seated in the coach, attended by his chaplain, and the sword and mace-bearers; the former carrying the pearl sword presented to the City by Queen Elizabeth, when she opened the Royal Exchange; the latter supporting the great gold mace given by Charles II. on the same occasion. The coach is attended by the Lord Mayor's beadles in their gold-laced cloaks, and carrying small maces.

Onward are seen the other leading features of the procession; the crowd is truly dense, for at this point is the great crush of the day; "the Hill" is thronged, and the City police require all their good temper to "keep the line;" the windows, too, are peopled with spectators; and in the distance appears the stately front and majestic dome of the most magnificent of London's temples of religion. The scene is truly exciting, and the good-humoured crowd presents many grotesque points for those who delight in studies of character. Altogether, the scene is as joyous a picture of a civic holiday as our times can present.

Our next illustration—

of the Right Honourable William Magnay, the Lord Mayor, has been engraved with great care, and is an excellent likeness. His lordship is descended from an ancient Scottish family, who settled many years since at William's Wick, on the borders of Cumberland, whence his father came to settle in London, where he carried on an extensive business as a stationer, at College Hill, Upper Thames-street, in premises occupying the site of the house of the famed Sir Richard Whittington. Mr. Magnay married Miss Norman of Vintry Ward in 1811, and sheriff in 1814, when the Allied Sovereigns, and the Prince Regent, were entertained with great splendour in Guildhall. Alderman Magnay served Lord Mayor in 1822-23, and died on the 27th of November, 1824, leaving four sons and seven daughters, of whom 12 are living. The present Lord Mayor is the second son, and was born at College-hill, and brought up in Vintry Ward, of which he was elected alderman in 1838. He served the office of sheriff in 1841-42. This circumstance of father and son becoming aldermen of the same ward, and filling the mayoralty chair, has, we believe, few parallels in centuries of civic history, and is a testimony of high worth and excellence, which it affords us much pleasure to record.

The Lord Mayor's Show is the only state exhibition in the metropolis that remains as a memorial of the City pageants. It originated in King John, who, in 1215, first granted to the citizens of London to choose their own Mayor, provided he were approved of on presentation to the Barons of the Exchequer, or his justices. Hence arose the procession to Westminster, where the royal palace was situated; and where the King's representatives continue to sit. Originally, the Mayor rode thither on horseback, until, in 1452, Sir John Norman, the Mayor, resolved to go in a wherry, and thenceforth the Lord Mayor rode in a state barge, drawn by four horses, till, in 1741, the number was increased to six: this state coach is represented in one of Hogarth's prints, dated 1747; but it is eclipsed in size and splendour by the state coach now used.

"The Show" has occasionally been omitted; as in 1817, on the occasion of the death of the Princess Charlotte; and in 1834, on the apprehension of political tumult.

The taxing masters of the Court of Chancery have taken possession of their new and commodious chambers in Staple Inn.

Some curious remains of the footsteps of reptiles and unknown animals have repeatedly been brought to light in the excavations of the sand stone in Storton Quarry, Cheshire. They are literally casts from the impressions made by the reptiles in the soft clay over which they walked.

THE MAGAZINES FOR NOVEMBER.

November we take the Magazine-monath of the year, i.e., the month in which, more than in any other, we enjoy the goods that the "periodical" gods termed "editors" have provided for us. "The First Fire of the Season" has been lit (see our No. 77)—we become feet-on-the-fenderish, and take to reading as a new delight. In the magazines themselves there is a note of preparation for the winter: the contributors buckle on their higher armour; the wits use their small swords more adroitly than usual: and even the wights who do "the heavy business" are less ponderous than they were wont to be. The demand, in fact, improves with the supply: scores of persons may be seen in omnibuses, between the Bank and Brompton, devouring "the new number;" there is a tremendous "rush to the poll" in Paternoster-row; and in country towns folks hie up to the reading-room, and bribe the bookseller's customer, with the feverish curiosity of Sir Egerton Brydges, who, in his own words, "panted for new publications, and devoured them, and counted the days, the hours, and the very minutes, till the new parcel arrived."

The magazines for the present month will satisfy these cravings, generally. It is true that they have the besetting fault of our magazine literature—one number is as much like its predecessor as two peas to each other. The contributors appear to be as much fixtures as the old man in "Sinbad:" "they are on the magazine," and are not to be shaken off. Their continuations are characteristically endless, and their conclusions never to be arrived at; each story seems a shooing-horn to another. A writes a smart sketch in January, and the editor calculates that the said A will be as bright in November; whereas, long before that time, he runs on his lees, and becomes proportionally flat and stale. Meanwhile, you have A's stock sketch, B's stock romance, C's stock poetry, D's stock green-room anecdotes, E's stock travels, &c., doled out, month by month, in unvarying succession, till the writers become almost as mechanical as the power by which their labours are printed. This appears to be a great pity—and editorial tactics; and until the well-informed, periodical literature, as regards first-rate excellence, will remain at a stand still. It is time, however, that we open the November budget.

MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT is most attractive for its working out the best features of Mr. Dickens's style—the caricature—the exposure of our social abuses: for example, who can forget the masterly hand with which he laid bare the badness of certain systems, in the hard lot of Oliver Twist, and the scholars at Dotheboys Hall. Our author's present object will be best told in the following extract:

The Anglo-Bengalee Disinterested Loan and Life Insurance Company started into existence one morning, not an infant institution, but a grown-up company, running alone at a great pace, and doing business right and left, with a "branch" in every town, and a "branch" in the centre of every one of them. On the door-post was painted again in large letters, "Offices of the Anglo-Bengalee Disinterested Loan and Life Insurance Company," and on the door was a large brass plate with the same inscription, always kept very bright, as courting inquiry, stating the City out of countenance after office hours on working days, and all day long on Sundays, and looking bolder than the Bank. Within, the offices were newly plastered, newly painted, newly papered, newly countered, newly floor-clothed, newly tabled, new-y cleaned, new-y fitted up in every way, with goods that were substantial and expensive, and declined, like the company's bill, to look flashy. Business! Look at the green ledgers with red backs, like strong orchard walls beaten flat, the court-guides, directories, day-books, almanacks, letter boxes, weighing machines for letters, rows of fire buckets for dashing cats confiagrations in his first spark, and saving the immense wealth in notes and bonds belonging to the company; look at the iron safes, the clock, the office seal—in its capacious self-security for anything. So lofty! Look at the massive blocks of marble at the chimney pieces, and the gorgeous parapets on the top of the house! Publicity! Why, Anglo-Bengalee Disinterested Loan and Life Insurance Company is painted on the very coal-scuttles. It is repeated at every turn. All eyes are dazzled with it, and the head is giddy. It is engraved upon the top of all the letter-paper, and it makes a scroll-work round the seal, and it shines out of the porter's buttons. And it is repeated twenty times in every circular and public notice. Then, there was a porter on the premises—a wonderful creature, in a vast red waistcoat and a short-tailed pepper-and-salt coat—who carried more conviction to the mind of a casual observer than the whole establishment without him. No confidence existed between him and the Directorship; nobody knew where he had served his apprenticeship, or explanation had been given or required. No questions had been asked, or answered in either side. The unanswerable reigned solely on his figure. Had applied for the situation, and had been instantly engaged on his own terms. They were high; but he knew, doubtless, that no man could carry such an expression of countenance as himself, and felt that nothing short of a million in such an institution. When he sat upon a seat erected for him in a corner of the office, with his gazard hat hanging on a peg over his head, it was impossible to doubt the regularity of the business. It went on doubting itself with every square inch of his red waistcoat until, like the problem of the nails to the horse's shoes, the tens became enormous. People had been known to apply to effect an insurance on their lives, and, instead of saying a word, to point to the serving soldier on his figure, and applied for the situation, and had been instantly engaged on his own terms. They were high; but he knew, doubtless, that no man could carry such an expression of countenance as himself, and felt that nothing short of a million in such an institution. When he sat upon a seat erected for him in a corner of the office, with his gazard hat hanging on a peg over his head, it was impossible to doubt the regularity of the business. It went on doubting itself with every square inch of his red waistcoat until, like the problem of the nails to the horse's shoes, the tens became enormous. People had been known to apply to effect an insurance on their lives, and, instead of saying a word, to point to the serving soldier on his figure, had gun or two, and a little tea and sugar in his other pocket, my dear, if you please, to be good enough to take 'em out."

This is irresistibly droll; but it has a more humanizing object to strike at another social abuse. From beginning to end this is a capital number.

FRASER is scarcely equal to the number of last month. It opens with a striking paper on Miss Bremer's three Swedish romances—the Neighbours, the Home, and the President's Daughters, each an intellectual addition to our novel literature. The "Recollections" are the "Recollections of Louis Philippe," "Warren Hastings on the Soul," and "Men's Wives." There is a smart paper on "Architectural Revivalism," in which Mr. Pugin's eccentric taste is referred to as Puginism: the writer is severe in his remarks, and has evidently studied very deputeable. We quote an anecdotical column from the "Recollections."

What was the situation of the Duchess of Berry at the Revolution? Why did she not rush from the palace of St. Cloud, and, taking the young Duke of Bordeaux in her hand, present him to the troops and the people, and exclaim, "BEHOLD YOUR KING!" Did she want nerve and courage for such an undertaking? Certainly not. Her romantic history in La Vendée, where she performed such prodigies of valour, would at once give the lie to such a supposition, could it ever have been for a moment indulged. There were two reasons, or rather three, why such a line of conduct was not pursued by Madame la Duchesse. The first was, that she lacked at that critical moment energetic and decided advisers. Second, King Charles X would scarcely allow the young Duke of Bordeaux to leave his side. And third, the Duchess of Berry was very innocently informed as to the real state of affairs both before and after the fatal ordonnances of her father and monarch. The Count de Menars had unfortunately informed the duchess at the palace of Pavs up to Tuesday evening, and on Wednesday morning she communicated to Charles X. all her uneasiness and anxiety. The monarch was imperturbable, and assured the duchess there was no reason for any apprehension respecting the result. Even the arrival of a young artist at the palace charged to take a portrait of the king, and who gave a graphic and learful account of the scenes he had witnessed, did not move that prince, who, after having listened with attention to the recital, said, "Ce n'est rien, tout cela finira ce soir: ce n'est presque rien. Tenez, mon cher, ce que vous avez de mieux à faire c'est de commencer mon portrait." And then Charles X. sat down before the artist, and his features did not evince the slightest change. Not so the painter: he could not proceed. The king perceived it. "Eh bien!" said the monarch, with inexhaustible composure, "ce sera pour la semaine prochaine." When the artist withdrew, the Duchess of Berry gave herself up to an agony of grief and Charles X. and the Duke d'Angoulême both sought to console her. That was the moment in which she stood in need of wise, firm, and courageous advisers. But there were none who stepped forward, and the cause of her son was lost. I know very well that there are some persons, still accurately informed with regard to the events of 1830, who imagine, had but the Duchess of Berry acted as I have suggested she should have done, she would have been made a prisoner, and that her son would have been shot. I do not believe this. The moment for such a line of conduct as that I have described, would have been on the Thursday at noon, as soon as the forces of the king had retired to the Bois de Boulogne, and when the Duke de Ragusa repaired to St. Cloud. The whole city was at that time in a state of indescribable apprehension. No government had been yet established; the fear of a bombardment was very general; new barricades had been everywhere thrown up; it was not believed by any one that the conflict had terminated; the orders of Mortemart were looked to with the most implicit expectations. The Hotel de Ville was the spot to which report was brought of the arrival of fresh troops from certain garrisons, and of the determination of Charles X. to bombard Paris the next day; and these reports came from those known to the whole popu ation. That then was the moment when, if the heroic Duchess of Berry had appeared, without escort, without soldiers or guards, in the midst of the people, and had exclaimed, "Charles X. and the Duke d'Angoulême have both abdicated; the ordonnances of Sunday last are withdrawn; the Chambers are to meet immediately; CASIMIR PERIER is prime minister; and now, BEHOLD YOUR KING—Henry V.!" I feel not the smallest doubt but her son would have been crowned with abundant success, and that all other hopes and combinations would have been at once abandoned. I admit that to have met the populace, to have faced the yet vengeful and but partially avenged Parisians, would have required much nerve, vigour, and presence and strength of mind. But it is precisely because the Duchess of Berry was one of a manly, and because her maternal love was stronger than all the first objects, that therefore I advert to this matter. The great effort was made for the son of the duchess, until it was "too late;" and he was neither to be seen nor heard of at a moment when all was ordered and apparent. It is not impossible that the duke himself may be visiting England even

THE FLEMISH FARM, WINDSOR GREAT PARK.

THE FLEMISH FARM, WINDSOR GREAT PARK.

The Flemish Farm (named from the Flemish mode of agriculture used on it,) has recently excited considerable interest from its having passed into the hands of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, whose attention to agricultural pursuits is well known. The origin of this establishment, and its present improved condition, will, therefore, doubtless, be acceptable to our readers; and the former cannot be better stated than in the following letter from Mr. Kent, land surveyor, bearing date 1796 :—

In 1791, on the death of the late ranger, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland, the Great Park at Windsor, about 4,000 acres, fell into his Majesty's possession. It might truly be called a rough jewel. The whole, as a natural object was grand and beautiful, of a forest appearance, but the parts were crowded and indistinct. The soil was various, some parts clay and loam, and some sharp gravel, or poor sand; a great part of the former was covered with rushes and molehills, and the latter with fern and moss.

About 1000 acres of the lightest part were separated from the rest at one extremity, and formed what is called the Norfolk farm; about 400 acres more at the other extremity, of a good loamy soil, were separated, and called the Flemish Farm both being named from the nature of the husbandry meant to be adopted upon them.

The rest (about 2,400 acres) remains still in plantations and park; and though so much reduced, yet, from the improvements which have been made upon it, is now capable of carrying more stock than the whole 4000 acres did before.

The Flemish Farm was so named from an intention, at first, of carrying on a system of husbandry similar to that practised in Flanders, which consists of an alternate crop for man and beast; but the soil being strong and cold also, upon trial, it has been found to answer best under a four-course shift, more like some parts of Gloucestershire. As thus: first year, wheat; second, coarse or clover; third, oats; fourth, beans. The quantity of arable land on this farm is 160 acres, or 40 acres in a shift.

The true light of viewing these improvements is, to consider them as a set of new creations of employment, for so it is a fact not to be controverted, that the reduced number of acres in the Park from their improved state, supports as many deer and other cattle as the whole did before, the produce of the farms is all clear gain; and as the crop of wheat and rye from the 160 acres sown, of an average moderate calculation, may be set at 5330 bushels, and allowing six bushels to a human mouth, this gives a yearly provision in bread for 889 people, to say nothing of the fattening of 40 oxen, the breed of 800 sheep, and the growth of at least 5000 bushels of oats and beans, all of which, it must be observed, goes in aid of the public market, as the work is done by oxen entirely.

A small overshot mill is erected, and worked by the waste water from the lake below the Lodge where a sufficiency of corn, two-thirds wheat, and one-third rye, is ground, dressed, and given to all the labourers, at 1s. 4d. per stone, of 14lbs., in quantities suitable to the size of their families, which is the first of all monieres to them, and a saving of at least 20 per cent. to what it would cost them to buy it from the meal-men or shopkeepers.

Upon the two farms and the Great Park, 200 oxen are kept, including those coming on and going off. Forty are bought in every year, rising three years, and are kept as succession oxen in the park; 120 are under work; and 40 every year are fatted off, rising 7 years.

"The buildings of the Flemish farms are comfortable, and on a compact scale, and there is one new cottage erected; and an old banqueting house converted into two others, in which his Majesty has put three of the most exemplary farm, or park, labourers and their families.—Letter to S. J. Sinclair, Esq., from J. Robinson, Esq., Surveyor General of Woods."

The Flemish Farm was neglected during the reign of George IV., but again became the hobby of royalty during the life of William IV., to whom, as well as to Queen Adelaide, it became a source of constant recreation. Her present Majesty, on her accession, continued to it a liberal patronage; and from her hands it passed to Prince Albert, in whose possession it still remains. There his Royal Highness passes much of his leisure time, and has already succeeded in breeding a number of remarkably fine specimens of sheep, pigs, and cattle. The last, and finest, of the produce of the farm, are a pair of West Highland cattle, which we have engraved.

The farm is situated about a mile and a quarter to the right of the equestrian statue of George III., in Windsor Great Park. The resident bailiff is a Mr. Graffheim; but the supreme director is Colonel Wemyss. The produce of the farm is used for the supply of the Castle and the royal stables; and the surplus produce is periodically sold by auction: such a sale took place about three weeks since, at which Prince Albert was computed to have netted £1,700. The soil of the farm is a stiff clay: the greatest variety of improved instruments has been introduced; and the establishment is, altogether, well worth the attention of agriculturists. Her Majesty frequently visits the farm, and takes great interest in its superintendence.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XLV.

MR. FRANCIS HOBLER.

No one who has ever transacted business at the justice-room of the Mansion-house of the City of London can fail to recognise in the likeness we have presented to our readers, the talented and benevolent gentleman, Mr. Hobler, who, for upwards of half a century, discharged the very onerous duties of principal clerk to the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, and who has lately retired, full of honours, to enjoy the "otium cum dignitate" of a well merited and handsome pension. Mr Hobler was born of respectable parents, in the year 1764, and is now in his 79th year. His father was a native of the canton of Vaud, in Switzerland, and emigrated to this country, and carried on an extensive business as a watchmaker, in the neighbourhood of Soho Square, exporting largely to America and the East Indies. He was the youngest son of a family of four children, all of whom, excepting the subject of this sketch, are long since dead; he was baptized at the Swiss Protestant Church; and being the first child christened there after its establishment, he had numerous godfathers: all the elders of the congregation standing sponsors for him at the baptismal font. His education was carefully attended to, and included a thorough acquaintance with the dead and continental languages; many of the latter, particularly the French, Spanish, and German, Mr. Hobler speaks with the same ease and fluency as he does the English; an accomplishment which has been of the highest use to him in the discharge of his official duties. Connected with these acquirements were a vigour of intellect, a sparkling wit, a suavity of manners, and an amiability of disposition, that very early in life endeared him to his companions, and in after years recommended him to many a generous patron.

On leaving school, he was placed in the counting-house of Messrs. Bloche, the then extensive sugar brokers in Mincing-lane; but not liking the monotonous routine of a commercial life, he was transferred to the offices of an eminent crown lawyer, to whom he became articled; and where his assiduity procured for him the notice of some of the leading members of the corporation, who, previous to the expiration of his articles, gave him the appointment of clerk to the sitting aldermen at Guildhall. Having filled this situation for several years, Mr. Hobler was, on the promotion of Mr William Lewis Newman to be city solicitor, removed to the higher and more lucrative post of chief clerk to the chief magistrate, which he continued to fill to the entire satisfaction of the public, and of every successor to the civic chair, until within a very few weeks of his retirement; never, during that long period, having been absent three weeks at any one time, either for pleasure, or the benefit of his health.

PORTRAIT OF MR. HOBLER.

The duties of this office are far from being of a light or ordinary character. The Lord Mayor is usually some trader or merchant, but little acquainted with the laws he has to administer, and must, in most instances, depend entirely upon the advice of his chief clerk, who, in addition to the usual qualifications of a common law practitioner, should have a perfect knowledge of the criminal statutes and of the peculiar privileges and customs of the City. Indeed it is almost impossible to describe accurately the varied information of this most important civic functionary. The Lord Mayor is a little monarch, and considered by the houseless and distressed of every nation as their natural friend and protector; and hence the constant appeals to his benevolence from the sons and daughters of misery, too often simulated by artful and designing vagabonds, not only demand that his clerk should be well versed in the continental tongues, but that he should be gifted with a nice perception of human character, which few possess, and is only to be obtained by long and close observation. And equally applicable is this last remark to the investigation of crime; for, as is justly remarked by Mr. Hobler, jun., in his letter to the Town Clerk of London, detailing the duties of his father's office—"Many an abhorrence, by a word from him, has been dissuaded from committing for trial the youthful offender not yet hardened in crime, and the thief of necessity has been admonished, and perhaps so relieved as not again to be tempted."

All these qualifications were united in Mr. Hobler; and, to his honour it should be known, that over and over again when the funds placed at his disposal by the Lord Mayor and other charitable persons were insufficient to relieve the urgencies of the applicants for charity, his own purse was at their command, and drew forth from many a grateful heart sincere and fervent prayers for his welfare. To foreigners in particular, the worthy gentleman was ever accessible; and his kindness to the unfortunate Spanish, Italian, Polish, and other political refugees will long be remembered by them, and has caused many a curious letter of thanks, addressed "A son Excellence le tres Honorable Monsieur le Secretaire Generale du M.lord Maire de Londres." These the old gentleman highly prizes.

But whilst in Mr. Hobler the truly wretched and unfortunate ever found a compassionate and sympathising friend, he was a constant terror to the confirmed beggar and hardened criminal; the recognition of his keen and penetrating eye, followed by the notice, "You and I are old friends, I think," being always fatal to their pursuits for at least some time to come.

One illustration of Mr. Hobler's vividness of recollection is very amusing. A daring young thief having been brought up at the Mansion-house on a charge of burglary, the old gentleman eyed him through his glass, and said, "we have seen each other before now." "No, we haven't, old boy," was the impudent reply, upon which, quietly turning on his seat, Mr. Hobler said, "I think I've an invite of yours," and opening a drawer took out and read, to the great merriment of the listeners, a card printed in the hand-writing of the prisoner in red ink, soliciting the favour of his friends' attendance at a public-house in the Borough, to get "gloriously drunk," and which had been taken from his person on a commitment to Bridewell, many years before, as a rogue and vagabond.

In personal appearance, Mr. Hobler is a fine, tall, upright, powdered-headed gentleman of the old school, always neatly, though somewhat eccentrically dressed, in a closely buttoned-up black coat, drab breeches and gaiters, which seem to be essential to, and form a part of his very existence. In fact, it is pretty well ascertained that he never was seen in trousers; although some of his friends have a vague recollection that in former years he sometimes wore pantaloons, and Hessian boots.

In his habits he is perfectly regular, and, notwithstanding his advanced age, never rode, but always walked to and from his residence in Queen's-row, Pentonville, and the Mansion House, and with such exactness as to time, that his appearance on any part of his journey was a sure indication of the precise hour of the day.

In conversation Mr Hobler is highly intellectual and facetious, and the readiness of his repartee has long instilled him par excellence the civic wit. In his family and amongst his personal friends he is greatly esteemed and beloved. It should be mentioned that some time since a portrait of Mr. Hobler was painted by, we believe, a lady artist, residing in Rathbone-place, from which was taken a lithographic drawing, which has had a ready sale. The original painting, since his retirement, has been purchased and handsomely framed at the expense of the Lord Mayor, and now graces the wall of the justice-room, immediately behind his lordship's chair.

Of Mr. Hobler's political opinions nothing is known; but we suppose, from the general pliancy of his disposition, they are of the "anything-arian" school. He married at an early age. His family consists of two sons and two daughters, one son being the well-known solicitor, whose professional services in the cases of Courvoisier, the Custom-house Frauds, and those of numerous notorious offenders, have raised him to considerable eminence as a crown lawyer. The other son is a large settler and wealthy agriculturist in New South Wales; and of his daughters, one is married and living in Canada, and the other is single and resides at home with her father.

We cannot close this sketch without mentioning, that all sorts of applications were made to Mr. Hobler in his official capacity; and we give, as a curious specimen of the march of mind among the people, the copy, verbatim et literatim, of a letter, enclosing the half of a £5 Bank of England note, forwarded to the worthy Chief Clerk, in November, last year, for the purchase of a share in some German lottery.

It is needless to observe, that the half note was returned to the speculative and silly writer, with a hint that he could more usefully apply it to the wants of his family.

Another curious document, which has come into our hands, and is in the handwriting of Mr. Hobler, is a copy of the commitment of two of the first English Quakers in 1661, for not removing their hats on the passing of the Lord Mayor to the Guildhall, and is subjoined, as a singular instance of the liberty of those times:—

London Ss.

These are to require you to receive into your custody the bodies of Walter Hewling and John Cripps, herewith sent you, who this present day standing in the way, as I was passing to the Guildhall, with their hats on their heads, in a bold and irreverent manner, and being asked why they did so, and were required to take off their hats, they said they would not, and, afterwards being brought to Guildhall, were commanded again to put off their hats, yet they did, in a contemptuous manner, keep on their hats, which being, by my command, taken off, they put them on their heads again, before me and the Court of Aldermen,—and for other misdemeanors, and them safely keep till they shall find sufficient sureties to appear at the next sessions of the peace to answer the same, and in the mean time to be of good behaviour, or otherwise to be discharged by due course of law, and this shall be your warrant. Dated the 17th October, 1661.

To the Keeper of the Poultry Compter. RICHARD BROWN, Mayor.

THE NEW GUILDHALL, BRISTOL.

THE NEW GUILDHALL, BRISTOL.

The foundation-stone of this handsome edifice, to be erected on the site of the old hall, in Broad-street, Bristol, was laid with great ceremony on Monday week. At one o'clock the Mayor (James Gibbs, Esq.), the Magistrates of the city, the members of the Town Council, the Town Clerk, and other public officers, the Brethren of the several Lodges of Freemasons in the city, &c., having met at the Council-house, formed into a procession, headed by the "Clifton Juvenile Band," playing favourite airs; but in consequence of the unfavourable state of the weather, the intended route was not taken, but the cortège proceeded from the Council-house direct to the spot. In all directions every window from which it was possible to obtain a glimpse of the procession was occupied. The procession having reached the enclosure, the ceremony of laying the stone was performed by the Mayor, assisted by the Freemasons, &c.; its completion being announced by a flourish of silver trumpets. The Grand Chaplain then read an impressive prayer, and upon the utterance of the words "corn, wine, and oil," corn was strewed upon the stone by the D.P.G.M., wine was poured on it by the S.G.W., and oil by the J.G.W. The Mayor then addressed the company, who, having cheered his worship, dispersed, and the procession returned to the Council-house.

The elevation of the new hall towards Broad-street, shown in our engraving, is designed in the early Tudor style, 117 feet in length and 45 feet high; the central compartment rising 28 feet higher than the general front. The windows will be deeply recessed, and will have between them niches for statues and shields bearing coats of arms. The interior will contain the Law Court, Court of Requests, Courts of Bankruptcy, and rooms for the Judge, Mayor, Councillors, &c. The apartments will be arranged on either side of a corridor, 50 feet long and 45 feet high, with a carved oaken roof; and the principal law court will be similarly embellished. The design is highly creditable to the taste of the architect, Mr. R. S. Pope. The statues and heraldic decorations, the rich pierced parapet, the panelled turrets, in short, the general style of the details throughout the façade combine to render it one of the most richly emoellished edifices that has for some time been brought under our notice. Probably some objection may be made to the lower rising above the centre of the façade; it may have been introduced with the view of adding to the dignity of the building; but the long, unbroken line of our new Houses of Parliament, in the same style as the Bristol Guildhall, should have dispelled the architect's apprehension upon this head.

A spirited lithograph of the new Guildhall has just been published by Mr. Davey, of Bristol, whence our engraving is copied.

RUINS OF ALDRINGTON CHURCH, SUSSEX.

ALDRINGTON CHURCH, SUSSEX.

The parish of Aldrington, near Brighton, according to the last census, contains but one inhabitant; this "singularity," therefore, may claim for it "a nook" in our pages, as—

None but itself can be its parallel

The ruthless hand of Rebecca not having invaded the southern coast of the island, a solitary turnpike-gate house is the only habitation in the place, and in it resides the gate-keeper, Michael Maynard, a man with a wooden leg.

The living of Aldrington is held by the Rev. Dr. Holland, rector of Poynings, a village near the Devil's Dyke; but the church, as herewith shown, consists only of the fragment of a tower, a small window, and the remains of mouldering walls. This desolation is said to have been produced by the encroachments of the sea, as the mouth of the river Adur—Shoreham Harbour—was formerly in this parish, but is now choked up by shingle.

BOXMOOR.—Some weeks ago a serious accident befel the Rev. Thomas Naylor, rector at St. Peter-at-Arches, in the city of Lincoln, when he was thrown from a carriage, and seriously injured. Mrs. Naylor, at the same time, being killed on the spot. In consequence of his long-continued indisposition, from which there is no present hope of recovery, the Bishop of Lincoln has appointed the Rev. J. Ormond Darkeyne to have the pastoral care of the parish.

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE

By HENRY COCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "VALENTINE VOX," "STANLEY THORN," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXI
DISCOMFITURE.

DARNLEY, on being left by Caroline, as described, sank into a state of despair. For her he cared nothing: he in reality loved her no more than he loved any one of the members of the corps de ballet whom he patronised, but the fact of all the pains he had conceived with the view of making a noise in the world by virtue of Sir Arthur's wealth, being thus at once stunned to the ground, made him perfectly wretched.

But even this was not all. He had anticipated the possession of those hundreds of thousands which had floated upon the surface of his swelling imagination,—prompted by fashion and economy he had borrowed money, and plunged into a sea of extravagances upon the very strength of the vision!—but now that that vision had faded and left him without a single hope of its being realised, duns, bailiffs, writs, and prison-bars filled up the space so lately occupied by spectral phantoms, fours-in-hand, hunters, and hounds.

He had been for years pecuniarily embarrassed, he had always lived far beyond his income, and although his fond mother had impoverished herself by supplying his additional demands, he had never been really out of debt, but during the illness of Sir Arthur he amazingly increased his expenses—depending as he did upon Caroline's aid in the event of things coming to the worst, and not satisfied with this, he had no sooner seen Caroline's copy of the will than he became completely reckless, feeling perfectly convinced that nearly all Sir Arthur's wealth would at once revert to him; and, therefore, how he should ever be enabled to rise out of the difficulties into which he had thus plunged on speculation was a mystery he was utterly unable to solve.

Conscious, however, of his power to incur the greater portion of his debts being ascribable solely to the prospect he had of becoming the future husband of Lady Cleveland—a prospect which he had never attempted to conceal, but which, on the contrary, he had painted in the most brilliant colours—he resolved to keep the affair as long as possible a secret, and more especially as it was perfectly well known by a certain set to which Lady Grange belonged that his marriage with Caroline had been absolutely fixed to take place within three short months of the death of Sir Arthur;—as dogs were they all, not only in the science of divination, but in the art of knowing infinitely more about the intentions of persons than those persons in reality knew themselves.

By this set Darnley was constantly invited. They conceived, and very naturally, that a series of splendid entertainments would follow his marriage, and, therefore, in making up their parties they never by any chance overlooked him. Indeed he had an invitation for that very evening, and although he felt dreadfully depressed—having no other prospect before him than that of irretrievable ruin—he eventually made up his mind to go as usual, and to assume the air of a man quite conscious of his expectations being brilliant in the extreme.

In the evening he accordingly went and managed to appear in excellent spirits. Lady Grange was there sinning with all the fascination at her command, and dressed in her characteristic style of magnificence, but from her he kept studiously aloof, as the full conviction that the subject of her conversation would be the one which he was then most anxious to avoid.

He was not, however, suffered to escape. She very soon had him by her side, and having fixed him there, she, of course, found no difficulty in sliding into the subject upon which she was naturally anxious to obtain all possible information.

"Have you seen my amiable niece, Lady Cleveland, lately?" she inquired.

"Oh! yes," replied Darnley, resolved on sustaining the character he had assumed.

"And how does the amiable creature bear her loss?"

"Oh, pretty well, apparently."

"Then she is not absolutely inconsolable?"

"Why that, under the circumstances, could hardly have been expected."

"To what circumstances do you allude?"

"Chiefly to the fact of its having been so ill advised and most unhappy match."

"It was ill advised: certainly; and I did all I could at the time to break it off, but it would not have been so unhappy but for Caroline's horrid infirmity of temper."

"Infirmity of temper?"

"Oh! frightful!"

"You amaze me!"

"If you, by whom she has been known so long, have really failed to discover the fact, you amaze me."

"Why I have always imagined her to possess a most sweet disposition!"

"Now you amuse me!"

"But really, is it a fact that her temper is bad?"

"Oh! positively horrible! Even when she lived with me I could do nothing with her, but now!—It will not, perhaps, become me to say much more, but if she ever should marry again, I shall most sincerely pity the poor man, be he whomsoever he may, who has the misery to be her husband."

"Well, I never was more astonished! She always appeared to me to be most amiable; she never, to the best of my recollection, either said or did the slightest thing indicative of a fiery disposition before me!"

"Oh, I am perfectly well aware of her being a highly accomplished creature: I can, moreover, understand why she would be anxious not to develope her real character to all: still I am notwithstanding her consummate art is so well known to me—surprised that you have never perceived it."

"Well, I freely confess that I never have! And yet—now I come to reflect—Well! it is indeed amazing!"

"Have you any idea of what she means to do?"

"Why I did fear that before many months have expired she will be married again!"

"Have you any knowledge of the vessel?"

Darnley made a desperate effort to blush, and was partially successful, when, having bitten his lips with all the violence he conceived the case demanded, he replied in a faltering voice, "Why—I—certainly have—some slight knowledge of the man!"

"Poor fellow! He is much to be pured. I am not at all curious to know who he is: but he'll have a fine time of it: that's quite clear."

Darnley became thoughtful, and Lady Grange, conceiving that she had said quite enough for the present, did not interrupt him, but entered at once into conversation with a lady on her left, with the full determination, however, of pursuing her object anon.

That object Darnley, who knew her well, at once perceived: he perceived that her aim was to set him against Caroline, while to him it was equally clear that she then knew nothing whatever about the will.

"Now," thought he, "what can I make out of this? That she hates Lady Cleveland is manifest.

feat. Well. And still believing that we are to be married, she would, as a matter of revenge, so all in her power to thwart her. Very well. Now here am I, in a position from which I can never hope to extricate myself without marrying, while next to me is sitting a widow-rich and spurned—full of vanity—panting for revenge, and prepared to go to any length to compass it! Well. She would make a sweet wife, doubtless But what care I for that? What ought I to care for it now that you are staunch in the hour of need? Another true, but what is her age to me? She is wealthy! —that alone will make it for me a good match. I do not carry for youth, but for money; and hence by marrying her, my sole object will be attained. She is the element?—What! not to be sure of her revenge, and thus to break the heart, as she imagined, of Lady Cleveland! Why of course she'll consent. I'll try it. She is dear! subtle as the serpent—that must be remembered. I must, therefore, be cautious not to time is to be lost."

He paused audibly, and assuming the appearance of one extremely dejected, rested his arm upon his breast very correctly, and fixed his eyes firmly upon the ceiling.

"Mr. Darnley!" said Lady Grange at length, "you appear to be very thoughtful!"

"I replied Darnley with a sigh, "you have made me thoughtful."

"Indeed! thoughtful! Gracious! what on earth have I said to make you look so gloomy?"

Such inconsistency of having uttered a syllable tending in the slightest

"Lady Grange," replied Darnley, "having hypocrisy as I do from my very soul, the pie-ce you have drawn this evening has greatly distressed me."

"Do you allude to what I have said about the gentle disposition of Lady Cleveland?"

"I do."

"Oh that's nothing! Still I am sorry that it should have distressed you. I assure you that if I had known it, I would not have said a word upon the subject."

"Nay, but I admire your candour! Indeed, I feel greatly indebted to you for putting me thus on my guard."

"On your guard, Mr Darnley?"

"Lady Grange," sa he, after a pause, during which every feature that could and the expression of concern might was managed with really consummate skill, "I have a little delicate, I thoroughly detest it I like to be ingenuous, and will be so with you. I will explain why I feel indebted to you, and how you have put me on my guard, with all the collateral circumstances connected with the position in which I am placed; but as I cannot converse freely at so here, I will,—if, indeed, you will be troubled with me—do myself the pleasure of calling upon you, for I fear, after what has transpired, exceedingly unwise to leave your advice."

"I shall be most happy to see you, Mr. Darnley, I shall be at home nearly the whole of the morning; at least I shall be at home to you

Darnley bowed and left her side, but during the evening their eyes met constantly, and he as constantly appeared to feel dreadfully embarrassed: indeed, he did all in his power to induce her to believe that he had become enamoured of her, while she had vanity enough to fancy that she had fascinated him and more especially at last when as led her to her car riage, and as parting softly pressed her hand.

Of the real design, however, even then, she had no conception. She fancied, indeed, that she had regained considerable influence over him, and that the sinful exercise of that in Darnley would lead to the destruction of that which she imagined to be Caroline's future hope, but the idea of his being about to propose to her never struck her for an instant! And the thought of was the agreeable intimation of a conversation with a man whom she believed she really loved, and the prospect which appeared before her then, of being able to prevent that marriage, filled her with delight.

Nor was Darnley less delighted with the prospect which appeared before him. He viewed her even then as his own; and his imagination, after having dwelt for some time at the Bank, took a rural stroll over the thousands of acres of which she might have the title deeds in her possession, and then retraced to view her jewels and plate, her carriage, and one or more villas. That evening, at least, he determined, and he went to bed and dreamt of several other sources of wealth, of which, when awake, he had never even thought, and among which was great satisfaction among which Darnley might—every one of which was a fifty—and piles of guineas each composed of a hundred—till the morning I dressed with alacrity

They were both very artful. Both had resolved on having recourse to the same means, the same method of achieving their respective ends; that is to say, they had made up their minds to circumvent each other, by appearing to be the most ingenuous creatures breathing; and, certainly, seeing that dissimulation was the grand forte of both, it was a very fair

Lady Grange was that morning at home to no one but him, and, when he arrived, she received him with unremitting attention. He was dressed with great elegance, and smiled with surpassing sweetness. In a word, her reasonable was gorgeous in the extreme; but Darnley had his eyes as wide open as possible, although he was anxious to make her believe that they were far too much dazzled to enable him to see

"Well, Mr. Darnley," she enquired, with a playful expression which was slightly characteristic, "have you recovered from the dreadful state of amazement into which I unhappily threw you last evening

"I have not, indeed," replied Darnley, with a countenance indicative at once of great sincerity and perfectly unparalleled grief, "nor can I at present expect to recover

"Heaven, Mr. Darnley was too dangerous for me to be at all times candid. Some persons are able to conceal their thoughts, unhappily, I have not that gift. I must speak out. I must say exactly what I mean. It is foolish, I know, for, in an artificial state of society like ours, the concealment of the real sentiments is more frequently the duty than the part of those with whom we either are or have been intimate—becomes a virtue; but, I don't know how it is, I can not conceal it."

"Nor should I esteem you so highly, if I fancied for one moment that you could. No, Lady Grange, candour is perhaps the very quality I most admire, and that you are possessed of that quality in an eminent degree, I have always felt fully convinced. Hence, the effect which your cordial communication had upon me last evening. If any other person had told me that Lady Cleveland was a heartless coquette, and supported by her gentle character, alone, I should not have believed it; I should have ascribed it at once to malice. But, from you—you, who know her so well, and who, I am sure, would not wish to deceive me—the communication came like a thunderbolt upon me; and, as it was impossible to doubt its truth, I can not blame you indeed."

"Still, why it should affect you so deeply, Mr. Darnley, I am utterly unable, even now, to

"I'll explain I promised to do so last evening; I'll now perform that promise I'll explain all. You will be much amazed—of that I feel sure, but I'll conceal from you nothing."

Lady Grange now deemed it correct to prepare apparently for something most wonderful

Leave before the death of Sir Arthur," pursued Darnley, when her ladyship's arrangements for the protection of society in the event of such a calamity were completed, and I return of the warmest friendship. That friendship was the germ of affection, which soon, as I then believed, ripened into passion; but for that I did not blame myself, finally, passionate was made me believe, and I was, up to last evening, happy in the conviction of its truth."

"Is it," exclaimed Lady Grange, with a highly effective expression of astonishment—can it be possible?"

"Well" returned Darnley, with due deliberation, "it had been arranged between us that I was to be the friend of Sir Arthur, as he wished, and that I should remain in attendance during his illness, and since his death the day has actually been fixed

"Indeed!—perfectly bewildered! Then you are the person whom I then termed the person. Oh! how careful we ought to be! If I had had a single suspicion of the kind, I would not have allowed my tongue out, rather than have uttered a syllable calculated to wound your feelings; for I am sure you have been deeply injured by me, Mr. Darnley, believing you to be, in every point of view, a gentleman a term which compre hends in my sense, all the highest attributes of man, I would this very moment go and break off the connexion, not to stay one moment longer. I cannot trust myself to speak—unless, indeed, we change this most unhappy subject, and take especial care not to revert to it

But, my dear Lady Grange, although I have been wounded, I feel it to be a wound which has been inflicted, I feel that by inflicting that wound you have saved me"—and said am I with the hypocrisy of Lady Cleveland—and hypocrisy, under any circumstances, I abhor—I would this very moment go and break off the match, were it not that I am anxious to have your opinion, in order that, if it coincide with my own, I may be sure that I am not acting with unjustifiable impetuosity. What would you advise me to do?"

Mr. Darnley, I must not—indeed, indeed I must not be consulted on this subject" "Would advise me now to act—for upon you and Caroline I look upon myself your, indeed

Still, on a subject is to me so peculiarly delicate, I positively cannot—I do not feel satisfied in giving my advice. But you must not forget, Mr. Darnley, that although Lady Cleveland is fickle, vain, unknown, and heartless, she is rich."

"I care nothing for that. Wealth is not my object. I know its advantages, of course; but why should I sacrifice my happiness for it, when the whole of our family estates must, of necessity at the death of my mother, revert to me? No, Lady Grange, I care not for her riches—I look at her mind—her disposition alone. Happiness, my dear Lady Grange, is the only ob. That alone"

"In that case, I have no hesitation, Mr. Darnley, in expressing my conviction that that object will never be promoted by marrying her. You see, I am foolishly candid, as usual. You cannot wish to say smart and I cannot say that which I do not mean."

"Hence the value of your advice," returned Darnley. "The match shall be broken off this "Will you see her for the purpose of breaking it off?"

"How can I do so?"

"Oh! it may be done by letter, or even by coming to call."

"I perceive. I'll neither write nor call."

"But she will demand an explanation, of course."

"She shall have an explanation, but I'll visit her no more."

"Ah! Mr. Darnley!" said Lady Grange, smiling, "the very next time you meet her, you will find a re sistible"

"No, Lady Grange, I am firmly resolved. Her beauty and blandishments cannot tempt

"Nay, will never command a re sistance."

"If, she is not only a highly accomplished, but an extremely fine woman, Mr. Darnley"

"I have a weakness for beauty, I confess, but I have a greater for mind, and the person whose beauty is, in my view, of a far higher order; and whom, if I could, I would marry in preference to her."

"Indeed! But you say if you could! Are there any insurmountable obstacles in the

"I have not sufficient confidence in myself to propose."

"Oh! fully. Is that really the fact?"

"Upon my honour, it is."

Then does she pride herself on highly upon her personal attractions?"

"She is not to be sure; and while her heart swells with the kindliest feelings, she is conscious as a rule

Over a conscious"

"Oh! Grange, but in my esteem, far more exalted"

"I, I should like, of course, to know was she is, because I feel an interest in your welfare

"Of that I have had le proof."

"But, if you will take my advice in this case, you'll banish all scruples, and propose to

"I once"

"I as, afraid," said Darnley, with a look which he imagined might fascinate a stone, "that if you intend to act fully I allude, you must propose to her this evening."

"Yes, I would, upon my honour. If she be, indeed, the amiable creature you describe, I should not then, on the first occasion, be able to resist the presence in her more commanding her whose beauty is, in my view, of a far higher order; and whom, if I could, I would marry in preference to her."

"My dear Lady Grange, you inspire me with hope I will take courage! You are the adv to whom I should

I am aware of it. We are not the best judges of our own portraits."

"Very true. But, Mr. Darnley—I feel that you will be as candid with me as I have been with you—has this declaration been prompted by any feeling of spite against my niece? You understand me—are you actuated by any desire to wound her feelings?"

"No, upon my honour! I perfectly understand what you mean; but I assure you that such is not the case. My high admiration of your character has not been newly inspired Had it not been for her I should have avowed it long ago; but since I have had the honour of knowing you I have never felt absolutely free until now. Now I am free; and being free I venture to say for myself as your friend, that I am not unworthy of your regard, and that I am not to hope! With you I shall be happy, walk the promotion of your happiness will be my chief care. My whole life shall be devoted to secure it, and if it can be made perfect by constancy, and truth, it shall be—gentle one—perfect indeed! Say them; may I hope?"

"I assure you," observed her ladyship, in faltering accents, after having averted her hage, shing eyes, and blushed with infinite coquettishness, "of course I must have some little time to consider! You have taken me—really—so very, very much by surprise"

"For creature, I would not advise impedient haste, but feeling that you now have my happiness at heart, I would entreat that the course I am about to adopt, may not be beyond the reach of the importunities of Lady Cleveland, the sooner will my happiness be complete."

"I understand. And really I cannot say anything to it now. I feel too much embarrassed. You tiresome creatures confuse one so. Upon my life, I feel as timid as a child But come and dine with me to-day—and then—we'll talk the matter over more calmly! I shall feel more self-possessed—at present I am not"

"You have filled me with de ight!" exclaimed Darnley, as he rose to take leave of her "Dear Lady Grange, your kind invitation I accept with pleasure, and hope that you have the power to express. Adieu! adieu! Shall we not be happy!—yes, oh yes!" he added with increasing fervour, and tenderly raising her hand—"I feel sure that we shall.

That Darnley, on leaving, congratulated himself on the progress he had made, is a fact which will be very readily imagined, and viewing it solely as a game of circumvention he had most decidedly the best of it. But he was extremely apprehensive of being led too far—knowing that flattery, like rouge, should be delicately applied, and that if either he said or Lady Grange perceived that the former was applied with an object in view, that object unavoidably being to deceive; but the result proved at once the correctness of the application and the powerful influence of persons in the middle stage of life, when studied while these wiles are fixed upon giving check-mate. Still he felt even then uneasy. He feared that some slip might could not elapse before the fact of Sir Arthur having left all his property to Charles would reach the ears of Lady Grange, and as her knowledge of the world was very good, she would be resolved to use every effort in his power to ensure an immediate marriage, strongly impressed as she was with the belief

And it may, as a suggestion, be stated that Lady Grange had precisely the same feeling! She too strongly felt that no time was to be lost She believed that if Caroline happened to meet Darnley in the course of the day, she would, in the subject, in view, that object unavoidably being to deceive; but the result proved at once the correctness of the applications and the powerful influence of persons in the middle stage of life, when studied while these wiles are fixed upon giving check-mate. THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Friday.—The arrivals of English this week have been again very moderate. Although the show of samples here to-day was small, the demand was in a very dull state, and, in some instances, the inclination to purchase rather declined, as compared with last week's currency. The sale for foreign wheat was excessively dull, at a decline in value of 1s per quarter. Although the supply of barley is not large, there is quite sufficient for the quiry. The arrivals of oats have been trifling, and the sale for the article must be considered unchanged, and the rates may be considered as lower. Oats, beans, peas, and flour—the supplies of which were moderate, nearly resemble last week's currency.

ARRIVALS.—English.—Wheat, 3149; barley, 2293; Oats, 1810 quarters. Irish: Oats, 7760 quarters. Foreign: Wheat, 1050 quarters. Flour, 3580 sacks; Malt, 1030 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 48s to 54s, white ditto, 50s to 63s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 42s to 50s; ditto, white, 50s to 57s; rye, 34s to 36s, grinding barley, —s to 28s; Lincolnshire, 28s to 30s; malting ditto, 30s to 32s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 56s to —; brown ditto, 51s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 56s to 62s; Chevalier, 62s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 17s to 23s; Yorkshire and Essex, black, 17s to 18s; ditto white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s, ditto, old, 34s to 38s; grey ditto, new, 32s to 34s, white, 35s to 36s, boilers, 37s to 37s; grey peas, 32s to 36s; brown-made flour, 40s to 52s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, 35s to 38s per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, 50s to 58s. Dantzig, red, 50s to 52s; white, —s to —s. Rhine and Baltic, red, 46s to 48s; white, 50s to 52s; rye, 32s to 34s; beans, 32s to 36s; peas, 35s to 37s per quarter. Flour, America, 29s to 30s; Baltic, 22s per barrel.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 51s 8d; barley, 31s 7d; oats, 18s 7d; rye, 29s; beans, 31s 5d; peas, 32s 1d.

London Average of the Week.—Seven ports Daily.—Wheat, 50s 6d; barley, 30s 7d; oats, 17s 10d; rye, 30s 3d; beans, 32s 8d; peas, 32s 8d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 50s; barley, 8s; oats, 6s; rye, 10s 6d; beans, 10s 6d; peas, 10s 6d.

The Seed Market.—We have to report scarcely any transactions in the market, and prices remain as last quoted

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing 38s to 40s; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 45s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 42s to 45s; hempseed, 30s to 40s per quarter. Coriander, 10s to 12s per cwt. Rapeseed, 10s to 11l, 11s white ditto, 10l to 10l 10s. Cakes, 5s to 8s 5d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, £230 to £237s per last of ten quarters, Linseed cakes, English, £10 to £10 10s; ditto foreign, £7 to £7 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, £6 5s to £6 per ton; canary, 75s to 84s per quarter.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 8½d to 9d; of household ditto, 7d to 8d per 4lb loaf

TEA.—Two public sales have taken place this week. They have been well attended, and a large quantity disposed of. Prices are fully 1d per lb. higher than obtained at the previous auctions

SUGAR.—There has been only a moderate demand for all kinds of sugar, and for our last prices have been supported in every instance Standard lumps have brought 72s 6d to 73s, and brown loaves, 71s 6d to 72s per cwt.

COFFEE.—There has been considerable speculation in Ceylon coffees, and prices have advanced from 2s to 4s per cwt. All other kinds of coffee are quite as dear, with a steady business passing in them.

HOPS.—The supply of new hops continues extensive, yet the demand for them is active at fully last week's currency. Sussex pockets, new, £3 to £5 5s; fine ditto, £5 10s to £6 6s; Farnham, £6 6s to £8 8s; East Kent, £6 to £6 17s; Choice ditto, £7 to £10 10s; Somerset, £3 to £5 5s; Yearlings, £2 2s to £3 3s per cwt. Duty, £150,000.

Tallow.—The demand is good for Russian tallow, and prices are firm, at 41s 6d to 42s per cwt. on the spot, and 42s 6d for delivery next month.

Coals.—Adair's, 15s, Carr's Hartley, 15s 6d; New Tanfield, 14s 6d; Wylam, 15s 6d; Tanfield, 17s; Hetspur, 17s; Ailligworth, 18s 3d; Gosforth, 18s; Heston, 21s 3d; Lambton, 21s 3d per ton.

Smithfield.—Our market this morn- g exhibited a very moderate supply of beasts, in, for the most part, including those from Scots offering found trade at a pretty brisk sale, and quite equal to those noted on Monday; but, in all other breeds, exceedingly little was doing. The number of sheep was very scanty, owing to which the mutton trade was rather active, at late rates. In calves a very limited amount of business was done, and the quotations were with difficulty supported. Small porkers produced a trifle more but all other kinds of pigs were a mere drug. Higher prices were mentioned, and selling at from 2l 2s to 2l 8s each For Sabs, to sunk the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 8d, to 3s 10d; second quality ditto, 3s 12 to 4s 2d; prime ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 8d; prime Scots, 4s 10d to 5s 0d; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; second quality ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 8d, prime coarse woolled sheep, 4s 10d to 4s 6d, prime Southdown ditto, 4s 8d to 4s 6d; large calves 4s 2d to 4s 8d; prime small ditto, 4s 10d to 5s 2d; large hogs, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; neat porkers, 3s 10d to 4s 2d, sucking calves, 18s to 28s; and quarter old store pigs, 10s to —s each. Beasts, 4581; sheep, 23,000; calves, 178; pigs, 273

Vegetable and Leadenhall.—There was rather a heavy general demand here to day, on the part of the trade, for Potatoes, at full prices. Carrots, 1s 6d to 2s 6d; mushrooms, 2s 10d to 3s 6d; prime large ditto, 3s 3d to 3s 2d; ditto sorts, ditto, 3s 2d to 2s 4d; large pears, 2s 10d to 3s 6d; inferior muttons, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; middling ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 6d, prime ditto, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; veal, 3s 0d to 3s 8d; small pork, 4s 8d to 5s 10d.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The mercantile information received in the course of this week by the East India mails continues to be satisfactory, particularly that from China. At Hong Kong preparations on an extensive scale are in progress, for commencing business with Nankin, and with the other cities in China, now opened to our commerce; and a most profitable trade it was generally supposed would be immediately established between the new city of Victoria and the whole coast of China. Indeed, the anticipations of the Chinese have been received as equally favourable to the views of our merchants. At Bombay, our new conquests in Scinde, and the capacity of Kurrachee, as a commercial mart, continue to excite much interest in the minds of many parties.

In the leading lines of railway commerce improvement is gradually occurring, particularly in the Brighton, York and North Midland, and the Edinburgh and Glasgow lines. The great abundance of room still exists for a further rise in prices. On the Foreign Stock Exchange, this week, the demand, chiefly for foreign account, continues to be rather animated for Austrian bonds, which are 1 per cent higher. Portuguese and Russian are likewise in request, and on the whole our foreign securities is gradually becoming more and more healthy, the people being generally well paid for their labour.

In the money market capitalists still complain of the want of profitable channels for the employment of their property. Notwithstanding the large and increasing demand for immediate loans, it requires the aid of additional sums of money, still we cannot this week notice any rise in the value of money employed in discounting con- ercial and bankers' acceptances, nor has the interest on loans in any degree increased. The supply of money, for the unemployed interest, therefore, continues to be chiefly directed to the shares of joint stock associations, in many of which a great rise has been experienced of late.

The Money Market continued in the same state of buoyancy till the closing of the week appeared further progress to commence at the commencement of the next. The demand for account of 1 per cent, but they speedily recovered their previous value, and the Bulls were sanguine that the result at the time present will show the correctness of their time bargains. The speculators in the Share Market likewise remained equally confident that a further advance will soon occur in the prices of railway property, particularly in the Brighton and Glasgow lines, of which the shares are still very low. The Foreign Market has late material improvement in the price. The operations of the week, both in commerce and in money, we expect, extend in a most satisfactory manner, and gave increased hopes for the future.

THE GRAVE OF GENIUS.

A Tale, true, yet marvellous. By J. O. LA MONT.

"This is a neat pamphlet. The story is told by the clergyman who attended (the hero) in his illness, and is managed with ability; being imbued throughout with touches of feeling and pathos. The author enters into a detail of the miseries consequent on a literary life in London. The story also contains many excellent moral lessons, and will be read with general pleasure."—The (Edinburgh, Scotsman

MOURNING—Court, Family, and Complimentary.—The Proprietors of the London General Mourning Warehouse, Nos. 247 and 249, Regent-street, beg respectfully to remind families whose bereavements compel them to adopt mourning attire, that every article of the very best description requisite for a complete outfit of mourning may be had at their establishment at a moment's notice. Widows' and Family Mourning is always kept made up, and a note descriptive of the mourning required, when extensive mourning is necessary for the occasion, being sent (in town or country) immediately. Ladies and gentlemen requiring new and fashionable Black Mantles, Cardinals, Cloaks, &c., either in velvet, satin, or merinos, for carriage, promenade, or invalid, will find a choice of the choicest patterns of the season at the establishment, as well as black velvets, satins, and dyeings for dresses, of a superior texture. The Show Rooms are replete with every novelty that modern taste has introduced, in mourning, millinery, flowers, colours, headdresses, bugle berthes, trimmings, &c. &c.—The London General Mourning Warehouse, No. 247 and 249, Regent street (near Oxford-street).

W. C. JAY & Co.

FURS at WHOLESALE PRICES.—The RUSSIAN and CANADIAN COMPANY, 244, Regent-street, respectfully inform the nobility and gentry, that they have completed and have ready for inspection, the largest and most fashionable Stock in Europe, consisting of the richest Russian and North American Sables, Fine Sea Bronzes, Russian Ermines, Canadian Lynx, Mink, Fox, Squirrel, &c., all of the richest season's Skins, and manufactured by superior workmen at their own manufactory. Every article warranted to the purchaser, and if not approved of, taken back. The Proprietors feel assured that their system of doing business (that of giving ready money for the lowest market prices) which has procured for them the large share of patronage they have for the last few years enjoyed, will be found to command continuance of those favours which may honour their establishment with a call.—N.B. Furs repaired, altered, or altered for in exchange. Prices of Cleaning for Moths, Mud, Rain, Carelessness, 5s.

E. C. BOURNE, Managing Proprietor, Russian and Canadian Company, 244, Regent-street.

THE SPANISH FUR CARDINAL, just introduced by the HUDSON'S BAY FUR COMPANY, is by far the most elegant, as well as the most comfortable article of the kind ever produced. The entire disappearance of its cumbersome appendages, and its consequent superior appearance, as at once fashionable appearance, and as in every respect very superior to every other description of Cardinal. Ladies are most earnestly requested to view this very fashionable preparatory to they supplying themselves with Furs for the season. Furs sent for approval to all parts of the country

HUDSON'S BAY WAREHOUSE, Argyll Rooms, 246, Regent-street

FURS.—The HUDSON'S BAY FUR COMPANY, in announcing the introduction of the FASHIONABLE NOVELTIES, which are specified in their various advertisements and circulars, wish to direct particular attention to the fact that they are determined to adhere strictly to the just and well-known system which has placed their establishment in the high station it now occupies as the first in the Metropolis of the World for Furs—that of supplying the public with genuine Furs of the highest character for fashion and quality only, every article purchased at their establishment is guaranteed, and may be returned if not approved of. Their stock for the present season comprises some very beautiful and magnificent designs, which, being registered, cannot be procured elsewhere. Furs sent for approval to all parts of the country.

HUDSON'S BAY FUR WAREHOUSE, Argyll Rooms, 246, Regent-street

FURS.—GREAT NOVELTIES.—The HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY beg to call the attention of the fashionable world to a variety of Novelties which they have just introduced, among which the SPANISH FUR CARDINAL, the SAFETY MUFF, and the CARDINAL BOA, stand pre-eminent. The Spanish Fur Cardinal, which consists of the same being cut in the form of a cardinal, without the cumbersome disarrangement of its graceful appearance, is unrivalled as regards both elegance and comfort. The Safety Muff combines the comforts of the Muff with the advantages of a secure and convenient reticule. The Cardinal Boa is a very great improvement, as regards both appearance and comfort, on the round Boa, and is particularly adapted to be worn with the Spanish Cardinal. Ladies are most earnestly requested to view these very beautiful inventions, preparatory to their supplying themselves with Furs for the season. Furs sent for approval to all parts of the country

HUMOROUS COMPANION TO "VALENTINE VOX."
On 1st of November will be published, price 1s., the first Part of SYLVESTER SOUND, the SOMNAMBULIST. By the Author of "Valentine Vox, the Ventriloquist," "Stanley Thorn," &c. &c. Each part will be embellished with four highly-finished illustrations on steel.
The character of this work will be essentially humorous, but as the thrilling, as well as the laughter-moving, scenes a Somnambulist may create are innumerable, the object proposed is to create alternately the deepest interest and the most joyous mirth, by the portrayal of the extraordinary positions in which a man who acts upon his dreams may be placed, and the highly ridiculous terror he may inspire. To be completed in twelve parts.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, 4th Nov., 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Autumn has at length come upon us in his most boisterous form, and the weather has at last set in so cold and damp that our fashionables may at last be said to be driven to the adoption of their winter garbs. Nevertheless, I am still in some difficulty in pointing out any actual or positive change in our modes since my last letter; in fact, the transition from warm to cold has been so gradual that our fashions have altered, or, rather, have been modified, piecemeal, and it is now not easy to point out the difference between the new and old ones. As far as head-dresses are concerned, I should say, decidedly, that bonnets during the Autumn will be worn lower in the cheek and will descend much lower on the forehead Velvet and satin, of course, are the stuffs which will be most worn, but I am inclined to think that our fashionables will be tolerant of any shade; nevertheless, if I were called upon to state those which I think enjoy the greatest favour at the present moment, I should unquestionably say that the dahlia, the O'Connell green, the violet, and black, are the most predominant colours. Tufts of moss-bouts and plumes, disposed throughout their whole length upon the passe, garlands of flowers, veils, falls, and ornaments of black lace, will continue to be much worn. In looking to-day over the salons of one of our most fashionable authorities, I remarked three perfectly delicious hats, whose exquisite taste would be admired everywhere. The one was in violet velvet, lined with a shaded straw-colour, and ornamented with an aigrette fastened to a bouquet of marabouts, with tufts of Chinese carnations intermingled with Bengal roses; the other was in black velvet, ornamented with a heron's plume, and trimmed with little tufts of field flowers under the passe; the third, which was in imperial blue velvet, was ornamented with a humming-bird elegantly placed between two elegant puffs of lace.

As regards dresses, I should be disposed to lay down as a general observation that walking dresses affect the pelisse form. The corsages are made high, à-la-puritaine; the waists moderately long, and slightly stiffened; the skirts very ample and the favourite article very powerful resources. Sashes are worn very long, and are made of Scotch ribands, shot or plain. In bringing this bulletin to a close, do not let me forget to mention an exceedingly elegant thing I have seen in the shape of a redingote robe de chambre in printed Scotch cashmere, crossing at the skirt and at the corsage, with wide collar. The waistband was of similar stuff a redingote peignoir, with a lengthened corsage, falling shoulder pieces, and the back gathered in the shape of a fan. The sleeves half wide, and the skirt slightly training. Amongst other pretty things I saw at the same place, for-walking dresses, were robes of Edinburgh damask, of Victoria Pekin, or in toile de laine, the back gathered fan-shape, the front plaited, with ruffles above and below, plain sleeves, with épaulettes.

Having now given you everything that strikes me as new, allow me to conclude. Adieu!

PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION, &c.

Under this title a very elaborate return was made to the House of Commons in August last, on the motion of Mr. W. S. O'Brien, "Showing the total number of members sent to the House of Commons by the several counties, cities, towns, and boroughs, in England, Wales, Ireland, and Scotland, respectively; with the amount of population, according to the census of 1841;" and we subjoin the general summary as given in the return, together with the proportion of the number of members returned in respect to the population of the three parts of the United Kingdom:—

Mr. W. Farren, who is, we are happy to state, recovering from his recent attack of paralysis, is the son of the late Mr. Farren, of Gower-street, who was nearly as celebrated for his tragic as his son is for his comic powers. He received a classical education at Soho School, under Dr. Barrow, and made his debût at the Plymouth Theatre, then partly under the management of his elder brother, in the character of Sir Archy Macsarcasm, with considerable éclat. Dublin next became the scene of his histrionic career, and there he established a reputation that brought him into favourin that city, elevated him to the situation of stage-manager, and produced very tempting overtures from the Haymarket Theatre, which he thought proper to decline. Having concluded an advantageous engagement with Mr. Harris, Mr. Farren, on the 19th of August, 1818, retired from the scenes of his former triumph, and on the 10th of September following, made his first appearance before a London audience, as Sir Peter Teazle, at Covent Garden Theatre. His admirable performance stamped him as an actor who, in a very difficult and peculiar range of characters, had not been equalled since the days of King. Mr. Farren's assumptions possess all the elaborate finish of art, combined with the truth of nature; and his versatility is equally excellent, whether as the antiquated precise beau of quality, Lord Ogleby, or in that exquisite picture of fatuity, Sir Andrew Aguecheek. Of late years, he has obtained additional celebrity by his admirable performance of a variety of original characters, written expressly for the display of his abilities. Mr. Farren is not more than fifty-three years of age.—Dramatic and Musical Review.

POSTSCRIPT.

WINDSOR, Thursday.—This being the anniversary of the Prince of Wales's birth day, the 1st battalion of Grenadier Guards, under the command of Colonel Hall, and the 3d battalion of Grenadier Guards, under the command of Colonel Home, marched into the Home Park at ten o'clock this morning. The Life Guards formed the right flank, and the Grenadier Guards the centre and left to file immediately below the south terrace. Shortly afterwards the Queen and Prince Albert, leading the Prince of Wales, came on the ground, by the subterranean entrance to the grand parterre, accompanied by Prince and Princess Hohenlohe, and followed by their attendants; the troops presented arms, and the bands played "God save the Queen." Her Majesty wore a green striped satin dress and white bonnet, and the Prince was dressed in his hunting costume. Colonel Home, the senior officer, took the command of both regiments, and gave the word to fire a feu de joie, which was done by the Grenadier Guards. After firing the third time both regiments ordered arms, caps off, and gave three cheers. The regiments then broke into column, and marched past her Majesty and the Prince in slow and quick time, and wheeled into line. The two commanding officers walked up to her Majesty and the Prince, and received orders to march to their barracks. The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince and Princess Hohenlohe Langenbourg, took their customary morning walk within the precincts of the Castle. The royal family were taken walking exercise in the grounds about the Castle. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by General Wemyss, Colonel Wylde, Mr. G. E. Anson, and the Hon. C. A. Murray, went with his harriers to Richmond's Park. After an excellent run, his Royal Highness and party returned to the Castle to lunch. Mr. Patrick Fraser Tytler took his departure to-day. Her Majesty had a dinner party in the evening.

Sir R. Peel, Sir James Graham, Lord Wharncliffe, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and some of the other Cabinet Ministers, left town by the 12 o'clock train of the Great Western Railway yesterday, for the purpose of attending a Privy Council, held by her Majesty at Windsor Castle at one o'clock.

Mr. Pigott having followed the example of Mr. More O'Ferrall, and declined serving on the Peel Commission of Inquiry into the State of the Land Tenure in Ireland, Mr. Bewington, M.P., and Lord Carew, are nominated in their places. The Commissioners will, therefore, consist of the Earl of Devon, chairman, Mr. Wynne, Mr. Hamilton, Lord Carew, and Mr. Bewington.

The Attorney-General had an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at his official residence in Downing-street. The Earl of Aberdeen and Mr. G. W. Hope had interviews with Sir Robert Peel. Sir E. Knatchbull visited Sir J. Graham, at the Home-office. Mr. Murphy, the Mexican Minister, transacted business at the Foreign office. The Ecclesiastical Commission for England had a meeting in Whitehall-place. The commissioners present were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London and Salisbury, the Home Secretary, and the Dean of Westminster.

THE HON. ARTILLERY COMPANY.—At a Court of Assistants of the Hon. Artillery Company, held on Thursday at the Armoury-house in the Artillery-ground, the following gentlemen were unanimously elected:—Alderman Thompson, M.P., as President; Alderman Copeland, M. P., as Vice-President; and Alderman Magnay, the present Lord Mayor, as Treasurer.

ASYLUM FOR AGED AND DECAYED FREEMASONS.—A general meeting of the subscribers to this institution took place yesterday evening, at Radley's Hotel, Bridge-street, Blackfriars, for the purpose of receiving the report of the affairs of the institution; also, for the purpose of considering the propriety of removing one of the trustees, and of adopting such measures that might be deemed requisite. The chair was occupied by Dr. Crucefix, who having formally opened the proceedings, the secretary read the minutes of the last meeting, and also the report, which set forth the finances, operations of the committee; from which it appears that the principal funds of the institution are vested in stock, &c. The secretary next read the correspondence, which had taken place between him and the trustee whom it was contemplated to remove, in consequence of some dispute as to the authenticity of accounts. It appeared, according to the report, that a large sum was due to the treasurer of the institution by the trustee in question, Mr. Rowe. The stock vested at present in the funds amounted to £2,000. An opinion was read from an equity barrister, which stated that if proceedings were adopted, he considered that Mr. Rowe would be removed by an order from the Court of Chancery. After some discussion, resolutions in accordance were proposed and carried, and the meeting separated.

LAW.—INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT (Friday).—IN THE MATTER OF SIR HUGH EVELYN, BART.—This insolvent, who was before the court a few days back, again appeared. He had been in the Queen's Prison since 1825, and in 1839 a creditor obtained a vesting order under the present act, which was passed a short time previously, and on being appointed umpire, procured an annuity, to which the insolvent was entitled, and out of the money received the creditors had been paid 6s. 8d. in the pound. The case was now completed, and the insolvent, after his long confinement, was discharged.

SUDDEN DEATH IN GUILDHALL.—Thursday morning, shortly before eleven o'clock, as one of the waiters at the Guildhall, named Goodchild, was in the act of placing a tray full of glass on one of the tables, his lower jaw was observed to fall. Several persons ran to his assistance, and no time was lost in conveying him to the surgery of Mr. Wadd, No. 31, Bunnghill-street, but before reaching it the vital spark had fled. He has left a widow and a family to lament his loss. The body awaits a coroner's inquest.

DEPARTURE OF THE PENINSULAR MAILS.—SOUTHAMPTON, Nov. 9.—The new iron steam-packet the Pasha, Captain Wilson, took her departure from the docks at four o'clock this day for Gibraltar, &c., having previously taken in the Peninsular mails, which arrived by the seven o'clock train this morning, besides several passengers. Two most splendid thorough horses were shipped for Lisbon, being a present from the Queen to her Majesty the Queen of Portugal. James Blake, Esq., Consul to Vigo, also embarked in the PASHA. The Ladis Liverpool, with the Gibraltar, CADIZ, and other mails, arrived late last evening, having been detained by head winds. Her dates are Gibraltar, Oct. 29; CADIZ, 30; Lisbon, Nov. 2; Vigo, the 6th. At the latter place great disturbances prevailed. 800 of the National Guard had taken possession of the town, driving the Queen's troops before them. The British Vice-Consul and family had left Vigo. CADIZ also was far from quiet. An elderly gentleman, with his family, was returning to England by the Liverpool for the benefit of his health, but, unfortunately, died two days of his leaving Gibraltar, and was buried off CADIZ.

FOREIGN.

There is no telegraphic news from SPAIN in the Paris journals of Wednesday, but their absence is in some degree supplied by the Phare of Bayonne, whose is the journal of the Prefecture of that place, and has the same news communicated to it as is sent to the French government. We learn from the Phare that the insurgents of GIRONA still held out on the 2d with such vigour, that PRIM had been under the necessity of relaxing in his attacks until all his reinforcements should have come up. He appeared, however, to be reckoning as much for success upon starving out the garrison as upon the display of force. Wine and brandy were, we are told, becoming scarce, but there was still a supply of dried provisions.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTHDAY OF THE PRINCE OF WALES, NOV. 9TH.—THE INAUGURATION OF THE LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.

The sun shines bright on the glorious stream
That laves the world's metropolis—
Nov'mber bleak, could scarcely dream
To dull so fair a day as this.
And down the flood, in banner'd pride,
The civic barges bear away—
White salvo-shots, from side to side,
Proclaim great London's holiday.

And the sun shines bright on Windsor's towers,
But brighter glow the hearts within—
For there blaze three imperial flowers,
Unchill'd by care, unstain'd by sin.
And proud are THEY—the parent stems
Of the sweet buds their fair love rears;
Oh! not the wide world's diadems
Could yield a tithe of joy like theirs.

But there, the hope of Brunswick's line,
Whom a great empire fondly hails;
Whose sun will rise when ours declines,
We greet thee, Albert's Prince of Wales.
The sword of the Black Prince be thine,
And thine great Henry's kingly soul,
To rule our land with sway benign,
And know none save the law's control.

Bright is the scene—the Royal flag
In prouser blazon seems display'd—
The cannon roars—And lo! the stag,
Startled through hoary Windsor's glades.
The peer and peasant—castle, cot—
All bless the Royal mother's smiles—
Less happy in her sovereign lot,
Than as matron of the British Isles.

May Duty guide the monarch child,
May Science o'er his boyhood glow—
May Manhood's passions, stern and wild,
Never for sin's sake o'erflow.
Blessing and bless'd may come old age—
And when from life his name departs
May it shine out in History's page—
And treasured in the People's hearts.

TRAVELLING IN 1753 AND 1843.

The following advertisement appeared in Felix Farley on the 7th of March, 1753:—"Bristol Flying Coach to London in two days; will set out from the White Hart Inn, in Broad-street, every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, at two o'clock in the morning, and continue all the summer months; each passenger to pay 24s. and be allowed 20lbs. weight." On the 10th of July, 1843, the journey was performed in two hours and forty minutes.

THE DUBLIN STATE TRIALS.

The state prosecutions in Ireland form a very leading feature of our general public intelligence; and however untrammelled by feelings of party a journalist may be—however neutral and impartial he may wish to remain—however anxious he may seem to avoid grappling with political principles, except in the sense of an enlarged and benevolent philosophy, which aims at the honest well-being of the whole human race—yet so prominent a theme, so absorbing a contemplation as that of the Irish Government prosecutions, as they are now filling the eye and mind of the empire, cannot be passed in silence or contempt—or simply slurred over without commentary in the mere official detail of their public news. We will not, therefore, shrink from the expression of our opinion upon so much of the state drama as has already been enacted in the Dublin courts, nor from vindicating to our readers the judgment we have formed upon the conduct (hitherto) of both accusers and accused.

When so great a national question was agitated as that of the Repeal of the Union—and agitated as it seemed to us upon a system ruinous to the prospects and tranquillity of the sister country—spreading disaffection, engendering hatreds, and bringing into play the ungovernable wildness of the popular heart—worked with a boldness which smacked of rebellious tyranny and seemed to take the forms of sedition in more aspects than one—we did not hesitate to speak out, to declare ourselves at once in favour of law and order, and an adherence to the constitution as at present established and against the dismemberment of the empire by the abrogation of the act of Union, which, amid all the wrongs, miseries, and grievances by which Ireland has been harrowed and oppressed, has been proved to have increased her commercial prosperity, and benefitted her people and her soil. Upon this broad question we at once joined issue with the agitators, and confessed the alarm and anxiety with which we regarded the means adopted by them for the attainment of ends which we believed to be impossible of accomplishment in the first place, and which—if we admitted the possibility—we were certain would be fatal in the next.

On the other hand—apart from the terror-fraught infatuation for repeal which we saw eating like flame into the hearts of the people—we were not backward in asserting our conviction that conciliatory legislation, upon an enlarged principle of generous wisdom, ought at once to be carried out in the Sister Isle—that Government and Parliament ought to bend all their energies to the redressal of undoubted wrong—that another, a more heart-warmed, and a happier law ought to be given to her suffering poor—and that principles of education, and projects of commercial enterprise, and local improvement, should go hand in hand, in assisting the progress of civilization, and tranquillizing the temper of the land.

All such measures, however, and anything like them, were impeded by the storm of agitation which was raging and raging fiercely upon the subject of repeal. The cause of immediate peacefulness, under which it was worked, increased its power and its danger both. The priests were levying tribute among the people, and marching them miles and miles, in banded order, to these monster gatherings the ballad-singer was set to stir them with poetic inspiration the voice of history was called upon to send up its echoes from the past, peculiar with associations of bloodshed, and the massacres of former times—deadly and bitter hatreds were revived against the English and the popular leaders were pouring floods of wild, enthusiastic oratory, like oil, upon the flames which they had kindled, and which their burning declamation was to keep alive. Finally, the functions of a government and the law were superseded, and the people formed imitative courts of justice of their own. They were assuming, also, a military, as well as an administrative power; and to the courts of arbitration succeeded the militia of Clontarf, and O'Connell's hundred thousand fighting men! Government at last partook of the alarmed feelings of the country at all this, and resolved to strike a blow. Perhaps they delayed it too long—but they struck it successfully—and the result has been the state prosecutions, which are now the topic of every man's talk.

We approved distinctly of the bringing of these prosecutions, and we now frankly confess, that we disapprove as distinctly of the mode in which they have, up to the present hour, been conducted.

We presume it must be admitted, as a principle, that the serious responsibilities attaching to a state trial are of such a nature, that blundering over them becomes a serious and grave subject for reprehension that trifling with them is nothing less than a crime. A state trial is instituted either for the tranquillity of the people, or the integrity and honour of the Crown—if directed against imminent sedition, it may, perchance, involve the exigencies of life and death it may be aimed too either at the crushing of liberty, or the upholding of law; but it is solemn—earnest—important—and should be a grave and dignified proceeding from first to last; neither obnoxious to ridicule, nor frittered and degraded by cavil or trick nor pursued with indecent haste—nor surrounded by unnecessary difficulties—but followed out in a frank, bold, decisive, and unhastening spirit—in harmony with the dignity of justice and the manliness of truth. Now such has not been the character of the present Irish State Prosecutions—and although we can praise neither party in the matter, we must, assuredly, blame the Government the most. That the accused are, by every expedient, trying to gain time, and that perhaps upon almost false pretences, we do not for a moment doubt; that their object for delay is another jury panel all their friends confess; and making every allowance for the license naturally given to defendants, we still think that with the magnificent array of forensic talent at their disposal, and the honourable character of its possessors at the Irish bar, a course of quibbling is not the wisest they could adopt—no, not even if it should obtain them an acquittal. But on the other hand a quibbling by the prosecution must be disgusting in the extreme, and we candidly declare that we loathe it. We can find for it no palliation, and we think beyond question that the Irish Attorney-General has been guilty of it in its grossest sense. That functionary indeed has earned no respect, and seems already to have forfeited all the dignity of a prosecution, for which we think there was abundant reason—which we believe there is evidence to sustain, and of the principle of which we most cordially approve. So much greater the shame to the government official, who has unquestionably betrayed temper, infirmity of purpose, and dereliction from the greatness of his responsibility and the goodness of his cause. In a word, we fear he has exhibited littleness of talent, and littleness of mind, and we are heartily sorry for it. We cannot conceive why in a trial of so great importance he should have opposed the granting of four days' extra time to plead. He should not have allowed any advantage which the accused might gain by it, to have stood in the way of that manifest boon of justice. We forgive him for resisting the motions for the caption, for they were, perhaps, captious in themselves; but the other was a fair, just, usual, and reasonable request, as all lawyers know, and all thinking men will believe. It is very painful to see the devotion of a high public functionary to the art of pettifogging; it humiliates all connected with him, and gives measureless ground to his opponents in the public esteem. The Government has a good cause in its hands, but let it be, in the name of everything manly, generously and boldly worked out; let great principles be vindicated by noble weapons—let no slur be cast through any pettiness upon the fair seeker after justice; and whoever may have to abide the issue—Government or O'Connell—the prosecutor or the accused—may honour and virtue triumph, and God defend the right.

LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF THE TEMPERANCE MONUMENT, MOUNT PATRICK, CORK.

TEMPERANCE MONUMENT AT CORK.

The temperance cause is rapidly advancing in Ireland; and at Cork has just been laid the foundation of a beautiful Gothic tower, designed to commemorate the signal success of this "labour of love." The interesting ceremony is shown in our engraving, from a sketch by Mr Maloney, of Cork: the site selected is Mount Patrick, the residence of Mr. William O'Connor, of Marlborough-street, by whom this splendid testimonial is about to be raised. A very numerous and fashionable company were invited to attend, and a more beauteous or animated scene could scarce be imagined than was presented on arriving at the place so judiciously selected for the erection of the monument. The scenery in every direction from the commanding eminence of Mount Patrick is of surpassing beauty and attraction. The day was beautifully fine, and the atmosphere clear and bracing. Standing on the site of the intended building, the landscape in front was the most varied and romantic that could be presented in any other position from which the unrivalled scenery that surrounds the "beautiful city" might be witnessed. The lovely and fertile valley of Glanmire, with its rich plantations and handsome demesnes, extended far away in the rear, and in front the highly-cultivated land of the little and great Island stretched along to the left, intersected in several places by the estuaries from Lough Mahon, which spreads its broad and placid surface in the foreground, and was studded with many a noble craft. Still further in the distance might be discerned the noble harbour of Cove, with the forts of Spike and Haulbowline and to the eastward, an extensive range of country terminating in a fine view of Youghal Bay. To the right the city was seen to much advantage, and the "pleasant waters of the river Lee" could be traced along their devious course, through a rich and lovely valley, almost from the romantic spot whence they spring. Indeed, in every direction the prospect was most enchanting, and the changing hues of the luxuriant foliage at the opposite banks of the river, gave a pleasing and almost panoramic effect to the contrasted verdure of the fields and shrubberies that surrounded many of the splendid and tasteful residences that were spread over the face of the country.

At one o'clock the music of several bands announced the arrival of Father Mathew. The scaffolding erected over the site was decorated with a profusion of handsome banners, conspicuous among which was a very splendid one, on which was an excellent likeness of Mr. Mathew, with the inscription

"May long bless thee from afar
And his [illegible]"

At two o'clock, all the arrangements having been completed, Captain Irwine was invested with a superb white satin apron, richly embroidered, being of the same material as that worn on the vest of the King of Prussia, on the occasion of his visit to this country at the christening of Lord Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. To this beautiful emblem of "the craft" was added a massive gold chain and cordon, with two heavy bullion tassels. The stone having been lowered to its place over its bed, and the several coins of the realm, &c., deposited therein, Mr Howard, the architect, from whose design the building is to be erected, led Captain Irwine forward to lay the foundation stone at the north-east angle of the site. Mr. Mathew then addressed Capt Irwine. The architect next presented him with a massive silver trowel on which was inscribed—

Respectfully presented by
to
JOHN CAULFIELD IRWINE, SQ.,
On his laying the Foundation stone of the Tower of Mount Patrick, Commemorative of the enthusiastic reception given to the
REV. THEOBALD MATHEW,
By the citizens of Loudon, without distinction of Religion or Politics
Oct. 30, 184

On being handed the trowel, Captain Irwine addressed the company. The maul, plumb, and level were then handed to the proper officer, and the ceremony of laying the stone took place, according to the usual formula, the bands playing God save the Queen, and the company cheering most heartily.

The Rev. James O'Reagan then addressed the company in an eloquent speech, concluding thus: How pleasing was this commemoration of the union of both countries in the advancement of the mighty cause! and thus he hoped it would always be. The strife of party or creed affected not their cause, and the Englishman united with the Irishman in receiving its doctrines and honouring its founder. In conclusion it only remained for him to say, that he hoped such a feeling would always exist between the countries, as was well expressed by the poet when he said:—

England! thou free st, noblest of the world,
Oh! may the minstrel never live to see
Against thy sons the flag of Green unfurl'd,
Or his own land thus stain at liberty.
May their sold rivalry for ever be
Such as the Gaelic dream dearly knew,
When English hearts and Irish chivalry
Drove who should first be where the Eagle flew,
And high their conquering shout arose o'er Waterloo!

Several other eloquent speeches were delivered, after which the company returned to the hospitable residence of Mr. O'Connor, where a sumptuous déjeûné was laid out, of which nearly one hundred persons partook.

Shortly after three o'clock the company returned to town.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

[From our own Correspondent.]

PARIS, NOVEMBER 14.

SPAIN.

The Spanish drama, in innumerable acts, continues in some parts sanguinary, in others farcical. In Madrid the deputies make long and patriotic speeches in favour of constitutional monarchy, whilst in the departments their comrades in rebel against the Government, and take up arms against the Executive powers. Expert, and I do so over and over again, that the affairs of Spain cannot be settled in the Cortes, or by diplomatic agency—the disorders are so numerous, am bition so unbounded, and intrigue so predominant, that a terrible convulsion can only cleanse the augean stable. We are told by the French Government organ, the Debats, in reference to the majority of the Queen, "that after so many storms, the people of Spain call upon the young Princess for order and repose, relying upon the power of the constitutional throne, and upon the representative. They place themselves," continues the Debats, "as it were, under the safeguard of a Queen, of 13 years old, a feeble child, but whose name alone will suffer for representing the ambitions of the most audacious." Now, I am of a different opinion; I hope I am mistaken! Before the interior of the kingdom be examined, let us see how stands the capital. The majority of the Queen was voted by both houses, before the Queen's majority was fixed for, and 16 against the measure. The 10th the Queen took the oath in the Chamber of the Senate, the members of the Congress being present. The great question is then settled in respect to a legal act, but the question is not at all so much [illegible] very much doubt. For a time, the strong arm of the law and the bayonets of Narvaez may put down the risings of the people, but the day will come when the army will turn, as they have turned before, against the minister—for as Narvaez is called by the Moderates — and the majority of the Queen become the subject of discord and bloodshed. Narvaez has many and powerful enemies, and sooner or later he will share the fate of the late Queen Regent, and the Regent Espartero. On the 6th, a band of assassins attempted to murder this popular chief. I cannot better describe this important event than by translating the account of it as given in the Madrid journal Heraldo. It says: "A horrible attack was made yesterday upon the life of General Narvaez, as he was proceeding, at 8 o'clock in the evening, in his carriage to the theatre, accompanying the Queen. When the carriage had arrived close to the church Precheros, two persons on the left stirrups of the chaise, fired upon it at the same time as it was entering the street Desengano, opposite Horno de la Mastor. The carriage having continued its way, was soon after stopped at the General, perceiving the assailants irresolute, ordered them to go on to the next post. Several shots were again fired at the carriage up to the Calle de Barco. The assassins, who were all in cloaks and Andalusian hats, then took to flight. Several sentinels and escaped. At the first discharge, Don Salvador Bermudez de Castro, who was seated by the General's side, was slightly wounded on the forehead. On the second, the General made side-leaning, apparently dead, fell, exclaiming, 'I am dead.' The General immediately ordered the coachman to stop the carriage, and proceeded on foot, with M. Bermudez de Castro, towards the portal of Los Basilios. His first care was to have his side-de-camp carried into a house opposite the palace-door, where several medical men soon arrived, who were during the night to perform the operation of trepanning, although without any hope of saving him. The General sent an officer to the theatre to inform the Queen and the ministers of what had occurred, whilst he proceeded to the barracks of the regiment of the Princesa, and other points held by the troops. At nine o'clock the General arrived at the theatre, and remained there during the whole of the performance. His coat and gloves had some stains of blood on them. When the carriage was examined, the marks of bloody shoes were found on it, without reckoning those that passed through the windows. Several marks of shots were also perceptible on the table on the well opposite. This horrible fact has no need of commentary; its tendency is evident, and its object known. The death of Gen. Narvaez would have been the signal for a frightful catastrophe. The most serious disorders generally present themselves, on reading this cowardly attempt at assassination. We find that the carriage was attacked with twenty shots, that a number had passed through the windows, and that several shot marks were perceptible on the opposite walls! And yet, notwithstanding this attack by almost a whole battalion, not one was scathed—all escaped! Up to the 10th, four days afterwards, the police were not even on the trace of a single assassin! This proves that [illegible] As to what is written—that the majority of the inhabitants of Madrid are hostile to Narvaez and the present Government, and that the assassins escaped, favoured by the protection of the people Can it be otherwise? LICENSED VICTUALLERS' PROTECTION SOCIETY.—The tenth anniversary of this institution was, on Tuesday night, celebrated by a dinner at the White Conduit Tavern, when upwards of 300 members of the trade sat down to an excellent dinner. Amongst the company were Messrs. Pollock, C. Bleaden, D. W. Wire, James Wedmore, the Sheriffs Sir Brenton, Mr. Hook, the Chairman of the Protection Society, Mr. [illegible] Governor of the Incorporated Society of Licensed Victuallers, Mr. [illegible], the past Governor, Mr. Kemp, one of the Trustees of the Asylum, Mr. Blake, the Secretary of the Incorporated Society of Licensed Victuallers, and several of the past chairmen and officers of the School, the Asylum, and the Protection Society. Mr. J. G. Wood presided on the occasion. The usual loyal toasts having been duly honoured, the toast of the evening, "Success to the Licensed Victuallers Society," was given, and drunk with enthusiasm.

ST. STEPHEN'S, WALBROOK.—ALDERMAN GIBBS AND THE PARISH ACCOUNTS.—At the meeting of the parishioners of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, of a stormy and personal character, was held on Wednesday in the vestry room of the church. Mr. Cunliffe in the chair. The chairman said he had only one favour to ask of the parishioners and that was, that they would not make the single point of his state of the accounts. Dr. Croly went into a statement respecting Mr. Horner's assertion at the last meeting, representing the rev. doctor's custody of the key of the safe in which the records were alleged to be kept. He stated that he had no key which gave him any personal power over the contents of the safe, and a mutual explanation ultimately took place between Dr. Croly and Mr. Horner, who shook hands at the conclusion of the former. Mr. Ross said, as the question had been [illegible] counts was now in Chancery, it would be useless to continue these meetings. Alderman Gibbs had already appeared to a suit of his, and he should therefore move, "That the cordial approval of the conduct of the Rev. Dr. Croly be given during the unfortunate contentions in which the parish had been and was at present engaged; and that having been agreed to, he should then move that the vestry be adjourned until Wednesday, 3d of January next." Both these resolutions were subsequently carried, and the vestry adjourned. It appeared from the statement of Dr. Croly, that Alderman Gibbs states that he has no funds, that, on the contrary, the church is deeply in debt. Among the many improvements in the building of a new and capacious barracks on the site where once stood the celebrated Armoury, unfortunately destroyed by fire, and the present barracks are to be transferred into warehouses. A plan has been submitted to his Grace the Duke of Wellington, Commander-in-Chief and Constable of the Tower, which he must his Grace's approval, and the barracks are forthwith to be erected, and when finished will have an extensive and open view over Tower-hill, causing an excellent ventilation for the troops. It is the intention of Government for the future to have all the arms kept in the Arsenal of Woolwich instead of in this fortress.

In excavating a sewer in East-lane, Walworth, and when the workmen had got near to the Walworth-road, they discovered the remains of some old building, which for a long time foiled the powers of their pickaxes and shovels; at last they were enabled to cut through about four feet of brickwork, and arrived at the depth they had to go. The wall is supposed to have been the remains of Sir William Walworth's house, which, at the time he was Lord Mayor, stood in the fields far apart from any other house. The wall extends nearly fifty yards up East-lane. Sir William Walworth will be well remembered for the part he took against Wat Tyler in Richard the Second's reign, when he struck the blacksmith with, it is said, the very mace which is now on show days carried in the Lord Mayor's state carriage.

WOOD PAVEMENT IN PICCADILLY.—A new system of wood paving is being laid down opposite St. James's Church, in Piccadilly. The principle is that of Russell's patent, in which the blocks of wood are connected with an asphaltic composition.

THE MORTALITY OF THE METROPOLIS.—The last returns issued, which extend over the week ending Nov. 4, still, we regret to say, exhibit a very considerable increase upon the average mortality at this season, the number of deaths within the bills of mortality being not less than 1960, while an average of five autumnal years is only mortality of not more than 908, and one including the last five years, without distinction of season, a return of only 903 deaths.

THE WEATHER AND CROPS.—Notwithstanding the severity of the season during the last fortnight, the condition of the crops in the markets, and also in the neighbourhood of the metropolis has been of very good quality and supply. The growing crops have been very little affected, and the old supply remains very good.

[illegible] A public meeting is, we rejoice to learn, about to be convened, called by a requisition numerously signed, for relieving metropolitan destitution; it will, we trust, lead to the permanent establishment of several houses of reception for those whose melancholy wants now compel them to pass night after night in the streets.

KNACKERS YARDS.—We are glad to learn that the notice taken by some of the public journals of the cruelties practised in the different knackers' yards in and around the metropolis has not been unattended with good results. Government is, we believe, about to bring a bill into Parliament which will have the effect of remedying these disgusting scenes; it will, we trust, lead to the permanent establishment of several houses of reception for those whose melancholy wants now compel them to pass night after night in the streets.

COUNTRY NEWS.

[illegible]

KENT.—DECREASE OF CRIME.—At the recent quarter sessions a marked diminution of crime was palpably visible. At Folkestone, Deal, Hythe, and Dymchurch, there was only a few cases for trial; and at Sandwich, there was only one case. At Dover the calendar was so light that the business of the court was over by half-past one o'clock on the first day of the sessions; and at St Augustine's Canterbury, the business was over by four o'clock. Generally speaking, one half the cases brought before the quarter sessions might be summarily disposed of at the petty sessions, without putting the inhabitants to the expense of a formal trial before our Recorder.

NOTTINGHAM.—On Monday afternoon last a splendid silver tea kettle, with lamp, &c., complete, was presented to the Venerable Archdeacon Wilkins, D.D., vicar of Nottary, on the termination of his professional connexion with the town, as a mark of the regard felt towards him by his parishioners, amongst whom he had laboured 26 years. The Rev. Mr. Brooks, of Clinborough, near Retford, is the vicar of Nottingham, is to be the new incumbent.

OXFORD.—At two o'clock on Tuesday morning, the inmates of Exeter College were alarmed by a loud explosion, which shook nearly every part of the building. It was fortunately confined to a few unoccupied rooms, which, "Quod vide," had let off in the first quadrangle, immediately fronting the rector's lodgings, a large piece of brework, containing upwards of 4lbs. of gunpowder, and other combustibles. Unfortunately the damage done somewhat exceeded what was first had anticipated. A large number of windows were broken, and one of these "flustious gentlemen" was struck violently on the back of his head with a portion of the combustible materials.

INCENDIARISM.—About one o'clock on Sunday morning last a wheat barrel, situate near the town of March, in the Isle of Ely, was discovered to be on fire, and although the conflagration was soon extinguished, and but little damage was great difficulty in saving two adjoining stacks. The stacks were the property of Mr. T. Grounds, one of the poor-law guardians, and the fire is supposed to be the work of an incendiary.

SERIOUS POACHING AFFRAY NEAR WARWICK.—On Sunday morning last the son of a respectable farm [illegible] named Canning, living at Sherborne, within a mile and a half of Warwick, while riding across his father's grounds, between 8 and 9 o'clock the same morning, met with three poachers with a dog and gun, and after a brief altercation, one of the poachers, named King, shot at Mr. Canning, who immediately fell from his horse. The contents of the gun passed in an oblique direction through the left arm near the shoulder, one shot had entered the chest, and several passed through one of his eyelids, without injuring the eye. He is expected to recover.

BROUGHAM HALL AND ESTATES.—ANOTHER CLAIMANT.—During last summer, the overseers of John Bird, of Ashby, his five sons and nephew, laying claim to this property, their taking possession. of the same, their forcible ejection, and the trial which took place at the last Appleby assizes, gave rise to much excitement and interest throughout the country. However, it appears that Lord Brougham will not long be allowed to remain at rest, and he will again, it is understood, be called upon to vindicate his title to Brougham Hall and estates; for one of another large flock of Birds from Bongate, near Appleby, have lately been resident at the village of Clifton, near Brougham Hall, answering for copies of registers of births, marriages, and deaths of his ancestors, and obtaining other information, in order to perfect their pedigree and cause previously to their making a final claim to the property.

STATE OF SOUTH WALES.

REBECCA DISTURBANCES IN RADNORSHIRE.—During the last autumn rent week the inhabitants of the peaceful little town of Rhayader have been thrown into a state of great alarm and excitement by the proceedings of "Rebecca" and her host of "daughters." Rebecca did not exhibit herself in this county until the night of the 22nd of September last, when, about twelve o'clock, she and her lawless daughters assembled at the Penpistall-gate, a short distance from the town, on the new road to Aberystwith, and pulled down a portion of the toll-house, broke the windows, and partly demolished the gate, leaving word that "it a more convenient season she would call again." Similar offences have since been occasionally committed, and much alarm was excited. About two o'clock on Friday morning week the inhabitants of Rhayader were aroused from their slumbers by the report of musketry, and the sound of persons marching through the streets. The authorities, as a preparatory step in the event of a second visit, had sworn in six special constables, and obtained the services of Sergeant Shew, of the A division of the metropolitan police. These constables patrolled the streets during the night. So cleverly did Rebecca manage her business, that she was not discovered until the firing of guns was heard at the Penpistall gate, on the old road to Llandloes; here the work of demolition was quickly performed. This gate kept by J. Francis. The distance from the town is not a quarter of a mile, and the locality is by no means favourable, there being a river and houses adjacent. As soon as they had completed their work they fired a volley in triumph, and then proceeded over hedge and ditch, across the fields—a difficult route—to the east gate at the bottom of the town. The bells are resolved by an old woman named Sarah Rees, and the toll-house is tenanted by her and her daughter. The latter, that about the hour of o'clock in the morning they were awoke by hearing a person say, "Lie still in bed—we don't wish to injure you or the house, but we are come to hew down this old gate." They then heard saws and axes at work. In about a quarter of an hour they had completed the act of demolition, and after the gang had discharged several fire-arms, they departed. The table of fees was also taken down from the front of the house, and hewn into small strips. The mutual surgeons, Shaw and the constables heard the firing at the north gate they proceeded thither, but on their arrival not a man was to be seen. Immediately a volley of triumph was heard at the east gate: at the gate Rebecca had been equally murderous in a very short space of time, and the constables got into the street leading thereto, than Rebecca and her host were coming to meet them. Sergeant Shew soon saw that his little force was not of the slightest use, for the midnight depredators were upwards of 100 in number, and were all armed with offensive weapons—axes, hackers, pickaxes, and other tools and implements, but the majority guns; therefore he directed his men to keep close together, and adopt no other proceeding than that of quietly watching their movements, and to endeavour, if possible, to identify some of the party. But here identification was almost hopeless, for each man's face was blackened, and the best were clothed in every variety of the gentler sex's outer garments. On coming up to the constables, 'Becca, the leader, speaking through a horn, commanded them to "stand back, and advance at their peril," and as they marched past they fired several shots in the air. One of the special constables went close to the body of Rebeccaites, and was cautioned by one of them in an under tone to keep off; another of the constables named Morris then went up to the gang, when one of them presented a musket to his chest. Morris immediately exclaimed, "For God's sake don't kill a poor fellow." Another of the constables pressed forward to attempt to recognise some of the gang, when he was struck to the ground with a musket, the stock of which was very soon after blown over the heavens. When within a few yards of the Town-hall, they were met by another troop of 'Beccaites, about 50 in number; and in this manner they proceeded through the streets, at a slow and measured pace, keeping step as regularly as any drilled men. Sergeant Shew said to the rioters, "My men, I hope you will not fire," but no answer was returned to his remark, and they proceeded on the Aberystwith road, but, though not being close enough to them, and owing to the darkness of the night, they lost sight of them soon afterwards.

The Commissioners of Inquiry left Carmarthen last Saturday for Haverfordwest, where they were to pursue their investigations on Monday. They appeared to have expressed an opinion, that the generality of the grievances complained of are such, that they cannot be grappled with so as to have any remedy applied.

IRELAND.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—A meeting of the Repeal Association was held on Monday, Mr. Steward, a barrister, was called to the chair. On the motion of Mr. O'Connell, an address to the people of Ireland, on the subject of education, was then the necessity of being peaceful at the present crisis under any circumstances. Mr. O'Connell also called attention to the subject of the commission appointed to inquire into the state of landed tenure in Ireland, referred to the attack of the Tory press on the late Mr. Drummond for his enunciation of the principle that property had its duties as well as its rights, and asked how it was that the Government had become convinced of its rashness and propriety?—a question which he answered by assuring the Association that their change of opinion on the subject was owing to the exertions of Sir Robert Peel, who had the consolation of having set the stagnant mass in motion, and given rise to the prospect of a healthy irrigation. He wished every body to give all possible assistance to this commission, although not very well satisfied with its powers appointed. That, however, was the fault of the government, who offered to nominate Mr. M. O'Farrell, but that gentleman could not serve owing to bad health. He Mr. O'Connell) was ready to be examined, and he now stated that it was the opinion of the Association that every assistance be given to this commission. Mr. O'Connell next read the following letter from Mr. Sturg-

"TO J. M. RAY, SECRETARY TO THE LOYAL NATIONAL REPEAL ASSOCIATION, DUBLIN.

"I am this morning favoured with thy letter of the 9th inst., containing a copy of the resolutions passed by your Association on the 30th ultimo, and calling my attention particularly to the fourth, in which I am requested 'to specify what the questions are involving the interests of the United Kingdom, exclusive of those which come within the range of the Royal prerogative.' Before giving a reply, I would respectfully submit that the advocates of repeal should not, as I define was in advice the Sovereign in the exercise of that power. You contend that the Royal prerogative of the Crown is within the operation ai or nearly all the matters for which what was designated 'Imperial Legislation' is thought necessary; but, as it is a maxim of the British Constitution that 'the Sovereign can do no wrong,' the Ministers of the Crown, who are controlled by a majority of the House of Commons, give or refuse the Royal assent to what measures they please, and it is held by many true friends of Ireland that as long as we are one kingdom there cannot be some one body to whom the Ministers of the Crown are responsible, and that this body should be the representatives of the whole nation. If all who desire equal justice to Ireland agree upon great and well-defined principles, minor details will be but trifling matters of separate and easy adjustment, and recognition of an equality of civil and religious rights is eminently calculated to remove the prejudices of the honest-minded, the fears of the timid, and to show to the world at large that you are only impugning injustice for all your follow subjects.' Very respectfully,

"Birmingham, 11th of 11th month. "JOSEPH STURGE."

Mr. O'Connell then said, that he required an Irish Parliament solely for Irish affairs, and that the persons in the administration of them should have the confidence of that Parliament. (Hear.) The control of the Irish Parliament should apply entirely to the employment of the instruments of power in Ireland leaving to the British Parliament the general administration of the country, and the selection of its Ministers in the Crown. (Hear, hear.) The weekly repeal rent was announced to be £1070 19s. The Association then adjourned.

FORMIDING THE CASTLE.—A company of Royal Sappers and Miners are busily employed constructing barricades for the defence of the Castle of Dublin. They are to be made of wooden beams, between six and seven feet in height sharp-pointed, and, inclined for defence, and are lined with a breastwork of sand-bags, and with a platform for the troops to stand upon.

In the afternoon of Wednesday, a keeper on some lands near Doneraile (county Cork), obtained for rent, his master, Mr. Maxwell, who, it would be had been placed on the lands by Mr. James Grove White, to prevent the removal of the crops. Nothing is yet known of the circumstances. Lockwood's corpse was found in a ditch, the skull completely beaten in, besides wounds on several parts of the body.

The Penelope steam-frigate arrived in Kingstown harbour on Saturday last, it is supposed, with stores. A large number of seamen has been landed from her days in Strongford Lough, county Down. No one in that quarter can guess the reason of her visit RESIGNATION OF RENTS.—James M'Ternan, Esq., of Mount Alleo, county of Leitrim, has reduced his rents upwards of 25 per cent. In one instance he reduced the rent of a tenant, who held a large farm under him, from £113s to £ his own. J. Waring Maxwell, Esq., Finnebrogue, has, similarly, announced his intention of reducing the rents of his tenantry in that neighbourhood. Nothing last he invited his tenantry on the Finnebrogue estate, and at the town lands, his property, in the neighbourhood of Downpatrick, to meet him at the Finnebrogue-house, that he might explain to them his intentions. Mr. Maxwell stated, that the waste of his family had ever been "Live and let live," and it was his ardent wish to act fully upon a principle so excellent. Lord de Ros also has managed this property for nearly twenty years, to return 10 per cent. to each former tenant on his estate of the rent paid for 1842 and 1843; and that such abatement of 10 per cent. is to be made perpetual.

SANGUINARY AND DESPERATE OUTRAGE IN THE NEIGHBOURHOOD OF FINNEBRANE, COUNTY TIPPERARY.—A letter, from the above locality, details a sanguinary attack on Finnee House, the residence of Thomas Waller, in the neighbourhood of Horrisokane, on Sunday night. The rumour thus circulated has it, that a party of eight men, armed with guns, entered the dining room at Mr. Waller's, while that gentleman, his family, and some friends, who were also in the house, were in the act of sitting down to dinner. The ruffians at once commenced the onslaught, one of them wounding Mr. Waller with a pistol-shot, while he, in common with the other gentlemen present, made battle with the knives, &c. In addition to Mr. Waller, Mr. Vereker has been seriously hurt, and the sister of the latter is said to be in a precarious state from the united effects of alarm and her having received some personal injury during the progress of the fray. Since the above was written, letters have been received confirming the foregoing account in all its particulars. Mr. Waller is not expected to recover. It appears that the sanguinary wretches left two of their party as a guard on the kitchen and back entrance, while the other six were, according to the latest account of the outrage, busily deterred from murdering their unoffending victims by some alarm given by their sentinel confederates. Mr. Waller is a gentleman advanced in life. His daughter, Mrs. Stoney, is said to be also among the sufferers

SCOTLAND.

EDINBURGH.—On Thursday forenoon Thomas Patterson, who was convicted at the High Court of Justiciary, Edinburgh, on Wednesday, for selling, or exposing for sale, a number of blasphemous publications at various periods during the present year, in bishopin West Register-street, Edinburgh, was placed at the bar to receive sentence. The Lord Justice Clerk said, this was one of the most painful cases account of justice could have brought before it. The prisoner at the bar (Patterson) had been convicted of the crime of publishing and vending, wickedly and feloniously, impious, profane, and blasphemous publications, decrying the truth of the Christian religion, and devised and intended to asperse, vilify, ridicule, and bring into contempt the Christian religion and the Holy Scriptures. The prisoner had been convicted on no less than eleven charges, defining as many acts of publication, all of which had been clearly established to the conviction of the jury by whom the charges were investigated. He thought it his duty to warn the prisoner, that if after his term of punishment he ever again made the attempt, either in Scotland or any other portion of the British dominions, to give circulation to the works for the vending of which he was now about to receive punishment, he (the Lord Justice Clerk) begged to assure the prisoner that there was no [illegible] of punishment by fine or imprisonment which it would not be the duty and in the power of the judge to award against him in such a case. The case now before the court was the first of the kind which they had been called to consider for a long period of years. It was matter of consolation to think, that, after all the attempts which had been made by these venders of blasphemous and profane publications within this city (Edinburgh), the doctrines put forth by the prisoner, and others like himself, had not had the effect of making any very serious impression on the minds of those for whom these publications were more immediately intended. The sentence of the court for the crime of which the prisoner had been convicted, was that he be imprisoned for the space of fifteen calendar months. Addressing himself to the prisoner, his lordship said, "Whatever you may think, I have to say to you, that, in the prospect of pronouncing judgment upon you, I have prayed to Almighty God, in whom I believe, that he would vouchsafe to you the comfort, the peace, and the joy, flowing from a sincere belief in that adorable Redeemer, whose mercy you have hitherto so contemptuously rejected."—The prisoner (Patterson) wished to know whether, in his imprisonment, he was to be treated as a common felon?—The Lord Chief Justice Clerk said, that the court had no power to control the arrangements of the prison.—The prisoner was then removed.—On the same day, Henry Robinson, was placed at the bar, charged with publishing and exposing for sale printed books, pictures, &c., of a blasphemous and obscene tendency. The prisoner was found "Guilty," and his lordship concluded by sentencing Robinson to imprisonment for twelve calendar months. The prisoner was immediately removed.

The jury which convicted Patterson of blasphemy on Wednesday night, were all but unanimous in their verdict. Even being only a single juryman who dissented from the verdict which the other fourteen returned. Both Paterson and Robinson were removed to gaol on Thursday evening; and in the course of Friday they were subjected to the usual prison regulations, their heads being shaved and the prison dress put on them, after which they were sent to the occupation of breaking stones. The shop in which Patterson vended his blasphemies is still left open, though the most outrageous placards have been removed.

STATISTICS OF THE FREE CHURCH.—The official "Roll of Members of the [illegible] of the Free Church of Scotland, held at Glasgow, October [illegible]," has just been published. By the constitution of the assembly, every congregation of adherents to the Free Church, however small their numbers, was entitled to send two delegates—namely, one minister and one elder. It appears, from the official roll, that the whole number of congregations represented in the Assembly is 590; that the whole number of ministers is 341, and of elders 466—some congregations having sent no clerical representative, and others having sent no lay ones.

ROSS-SHIRE.—The Aberdeen Constitutional, quoting a correspondent, says "The free folk are again at the 'Moderates' with stock and stone. On Sunday last, while a respectable widow lady and her daughters were proceeding to attend Divine Service in the parish church of Fearn, they were suddenly attacked by a gang of Protesting ruffians, who were stationed at the gable of a wayside cottage. They subjected to the usual obscene epithets, and to the [illegible] of mud, which was speedily followed by a shower of stones. They, however, fearlessly advanced, but while passing in front of the cottage narrowly escaped being struck down by a heavy bludgeon, deliberately aimed at them by their cowardly assailants. On their return from church, they were again assailed at the same place and in the same manner; but they providentially got home without sustaining any bodily harm."

The Scotsman states that it is no longer doubtful that Lord Meadowbank has resigned. As we previously mentioned, Lord Cockburn will succeed his Lordship in the Second Division. On Thursday Lord Cockburn moved a motion to be made, that it had become necessary that all the causes in his roll which parties wished to have disposed of by his Lordship, should be debated without any delay. It is understood that David More, Esq., advocate, will be the new Advocate-Depute, in the room of Adam Urquhart, Esq., appointed to the Sheriffship of Wigtown. It was also generally rumoured yesterday that there was a proposition to nominate the Lord Advocate as Dean of Faculty.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER, WEDNESDAY, Nov. 15.

(Sittings in Error.)

IMPORTANT DECISION.—LIEN ON EXCHEQUER BILLS.

The Court sat this morning for a short time to deliver judgment in several cases of these the most important was the following, affecting the right of lien of bankers on securities lodged in their hands by customers,

BRANDAGO V. BARNETT.

Lord Denman said, that in this case the facts had been most fully set forth in the reports which had appeared at the time of the trial, as well as at the period of the arguments when the matter had come before that court in error. There were two questions, the one of form, the other of substance. The former of these points had not, it appeared, been a subject of discussion in the Court of Common Pleas. That question was, whether the Court ought to take notice of the general lien which bankers had on securities, or only might hold of their various customers? It ought to have been averred as a matter of fact in a special plea, and found by the jury, that the bankers had such lien. Now, that such a lien existed was not in any way disputed, but it was insisted on behalf of the defendant in error that the foundation of this lien was usage, from which a contract would be implied to exist between the banker and the customer to the effect that securities lodged with the banker should be pledged for the former for the balance due to him, and, being matter of implied contract, it should have been pleaded. But it had, on the other hand, been contended on the part of the plaintiff that the lien existed by general custom constituting the law merchant, and therefore that the fact need not be pleaded, inasmuch as the Courts at all times took notice and recognised that which constituted law merchant. The Court agreed in the latter view of the matter. The learned Chief Justice then went through other points much had arisen in the case, and concluded by stating that it was the opinion of the that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas ought to be reversed, and the verdict entered for the plaintiff on the first issue, and for the defendant on the second and third issues

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE IN LAMBETH.—At twenty minutes past eight o'clock on Sunday night, a fire broke out on the premises of Messrs. Ogilvie and Myers, manufacturers of coco nut oil and patent candles, situate in Paradise street, Lambeth, and in the occupation of Messrs. Kemp, Nelson, and Nelson. The first alarm was given by an inhabitant of one of the houses in Paradise-street, the back windows of which overlook the factory. A strong body of police from the station-house in High-street were immediately despatched to the spot, and summoned the various fire-brigade stations, but long before any engine arrived, the flames had attained such an ascendancy that all hope of saving the premises was abandoned. Several engines, on one side by the late Mr. Hedges's distillery, which, from the outbreak of the flames, and although a continuous and powerful discharge of water was thus kept up, the flames spread with uncontrolled rapidity to a range of small tenements in Morfolk-row, the entrance to which is from Church-street, adjoining the park wall of Lambeth Palace. There were sixteen small houses, of which one was wholly consumed, and the others are more or less damaged. The building was occupied on one side by the late Mr. Hedges's distillery, which extends from Church-street to Paradise-street, and in which were several thousand gallons of gin, brandy, and other spirits, in the various stages of preparation. Fortunately the conflagration did not reach it.

SUDDEN DEATH OF MR. WARREN, OF THE STRAND.—On Sunday night Mr. Warren, blacking manufacturer, of the Strand, had been to Paradise-street, Lambeth, on business, in the neighbourhood of Messrs. Ogilvie's chemical manufactory, and, on returning home, had reached Bishop's walk, when he suddenly fell to the ground. He was conveyed to the surgery of Mr. Cory, at the corner of Bishop's walk, but never afterwards rallied, and died a few minutes after reaching the house.

FIRE IN FETTER LANE.—Shortly after nine o'clock, on Sunday night last, a fire broke out in the premises occupied by Mr. Fenton, watch and clock manufacturer, 76, Fetter lane. It appears that by considerable exertion, however the fury of the flames was checked, but not before considerable injury [illegible] done to the premises, and the furniture destroyed.

On Monday, shortly before midnight, an alarming fire broke out upon the spacious premises occupied by Mr. Clay, 17, Doughty-street, Mecklenburgh square, next door to the private residence of Mr. Payne, coroner for the city. It was extinguished before it had done any considerable injury. It is supposed to have originated from a spark from a candle falling upon the bed-furniture.

On Sunday morning last, as the nine o'clock train on the Eastern Counties Railway was returning to London, one of the porters, James Bush, while crossing the line, was struck by the foremost engine, and thrown down the embank ment. Two of his ribs were fractured.

On Monday morning a quantity of plate was stolen from the house of the Prussian ambassador by a servant, recently dismissed by foreigner, who obtained admission under pretence of inquiring for a person who had formerly lived in the house.

SUDDEN DEATH IN SOMERSET HOUSE.—Tuesday afternoon, about two o'clock, a gentleman connected with the Royal Society at Somerset House had occasion to call at that institution in search of information, and was led into the room appropriated to the use of the under-secretary, Mr. Robertson, whom they found sitting in his chair, with his head leaning back, having been previously taken off, and quite dead. The deceased gentleman had not been seen since Monday afternoon. when he appeared in the enjoyment of his usual good health

A QUARDANT.—On Wednesday between six and seven o clock, much alarm was excited in the vicinity of Regent-street, in consequence of a fire breaking out upon the premises occupied by M. Gortze, lodging-house-keeper situated at 79, Regent-quadrant. It was soon arrested in its progress, and entirely extinguished, not, however, before a considerable deal of damage was done to the furniture and building.

SANTA ANNA AND HIS AIDE-DE-CAMP, ARISTA.

SANTA ANNA.

The recent conduct of the Provisional President of the Republic of Mexico, in enacting laws most hostile to British manufacturing and commercial industry, have naturally led to the question, "Who, and what is Santa Anna, who thus endeavours to drive foreigners out of his country, the greater part of which is lying waste and desolate for want of industrious inhabitants, with capital, enterprise, and skill?"

Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna is in his forty-fifth or forty-sixth year, but he scarcely yet exhibits the maturity of age. His pale complexion, his large black eyes, and his blacker hair, curled upon a lofty forehead, invest him with an air of distinction, and prepare you for his easy and elegant address, which is especially grateful to those who understand the rich and harmonious Spanish language. He combines, with this natural eloquence, the art of attacking the hearts of his fellow citizens, and the influence of his tone is irresistible.

He first appeared in the political history of Mexico in 1821. At this early age he commanded a corps of insurgents, at the head of which he seized upon Vera Cruz, of which he was named governor. A minion of the Emperor Iturbide, whom he had served to the full extent of his power, he was summoned before him for an act of insubordination; when, offended by his dismissal, which he truly deserved, he returned to his post, harangued his troops, revolted against the imperial authority, and declared Mexico an independent republic. He was joined by a general who had been sent to punish him; the towns of Oajeca, de Guadalajara, de Guanajuato, de Quevetero, de San-Luis-Potosi, and de Puebla, rose simultaneously, and scarcely a year had elapsed since Santa-Anna's first act of defiance, when Iturbide was dethroned. A few months after Santa Anna's installation in the new republic, he, however, revolted also against the authority of his Congress.

Such was the origin of the Mexican President, whose future career is too eventful for our present space.

He lost his right leg in defending his hitherto impregnable fort of San Juan de Ulua, in 1838, against the attack of the French. As a substitute for the natural leg he had an artificial one brought from Paris; the duli ence in which it was conveyed from Vera Cruz happened to be robbed, and it was carried off amongst the other booty. Upon this being communicated to Santa Anna, he caused a notice to be circulated amongst all the robbing districts, that if it was not returned in forty-eight hours the country should be scoured, and every one of them that was caught put to death. This had the desired effect. The leg was marched into Mexico within the specified time and adapted to his stump accordingly.

Our illustration portrays Santa Anna and his faithful Aide-de-Camp, Arista. The President wears the costume of a traveller, with a large woollen hat, heavy horse-boots, long spurs, &c.; and his état-major is similarly attired. Colonel Arista is Santa Anna's "right hand," and his inseparable companion in all his perilous adventures.

A correspondent of the Times, "A steam-traveller," gives the following decisive reply to the interrogatory commencement of this very slight sketch—who is Santa Anna?—"A comparatively illiterate military adventurer, who, more by that instinctive cunning, the characteristic of inferior animals, than any magnanimous qualities or superiority of intellect, has become the Provisional President of Mexico, and who, when the election terminates in January next, will certainly be confirmed as President, and may then be virtually considered as Dictator, for no one will have power enough to oppose him, unless some new revolution or conspiracy breaks out;—a man who is generally known as a gambler, cock-fighter, bullfighter, and debauchee. A man, in fine, who seems to be universally considered, even amongst his own countrymen, as 'un grande picaro.'"

"As might be expected, with such a head, the political and social condition of the country is extremely vicious and depraved; the whole government is carried on upon one continuous system of bribery and corruption, extortion and plunder, from the highest to the lowest, and every person holding any Government appointment considers himself justly entitled, as he only obtains a small salary, to make the most he can of it by every means in his power. Robberies are frequently perpetrated, and from their using knives in their quarrels, scarcely a morning passes, but some individual or other is not found stabbed the preceding night, and carried to the deadhouse almost without any inquiry, and no respectable person ever thinks of riding a league from the city without being armed with sword and pistols."

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XXXVII.

ST. PETER'S, ISLINGTON.

St. Peter's Church, as originally erected, after designs by Charles Barry, Esq. architect of the New Houses of Parliament, was a neat quadrangular edifice of brick, in the early English style, situated on the south side of River-lane, Islington. The church was consecrated on July 14th, 1835, and was built under the auspices of the vicar of Islington, at an expense of £9407 5s. 7d., raised by subscription, towards which, the Incorporated Society for Promoting the Building of Churches, &c., contributed £700, the vicar himself contributed £500, and the Bishop of Calcutta, £100; the site was given by Mr. Cubitt. The population of the neighbourhood increasing, and there being a demand for church sittings which could not be afforded, it was proposed, about eighteen months since, to enlarge the church; to effect which, the congregation were encouraged by the generosity of the Queen Dowager, the munificence of the vicar of the parish, with a donation from the Bishop of London, combined with a high respect for the estimable minister of the church, the Rev. Joseph Halsegrave. Accordingly, in the spring of the present year, arrangements were made for the erection of a new west front, with tower and spire, transepts on the north and south sides, and a new chancel with a porch of entrance and vestry at the east end.

The church, as originally built, accommodated 1099 persons; but by the above alterations it will now accommodate about 1500 persons; the majority of the old pews being, at the same time, increased in width. Warming and ventilation have also been provided; the former, by the introduction of four of Nott's patent register stoves; and the latter, by a series of ornamental, perforated panels in the roof, the admission of the external air being by apertures in the gables, and gratres in the walls themselves. Means of convenient ingress and egress have been also provided by separate entrances and lobbies to the galleries, as well as to the body of the church; new stone staircase to the north and south galleries; and a separate spiral staircase on the south side, leading to the upper gallery only.

These additions have been carried out in as strict conformity with the original details, as the nature of the alterations themselves would admit of; at the same time, a more important and ecclesiastical character has been obtained at a comparatively moderate outlay.

The exterior throughout is of brick and Bath stone. The tower and spire occupy the north angle of the west front, rising 120 feet, flanked by massive buttresses of two stages with slender stone pillars up the angles, with stone caps and bases, the front faces of the buttress caps being cut into trefoil panels, and the buttresses themselves connected with the tower by splayed angles as high as the base of the belfry.

On the north side of the tower is a stone door-way of entrance to the staircase of the north gallery: it has a moulded arch upon columns and corbels, with crocketed gable, and cross finial, and a lancet-headed window over the same. On the west front of the tower is a similar lancet-headed window, occupying nearly the entire space between the string-course of the building and the arched heads immediately under the crocketed gables of the lower story of the tower. Above, the tower takes the form of an irregular octagon, and detaches itself from the second tier of buttresses; except by the stone flying buttresses, which spring out of them at the four angles, and connect the same with the belfry, or second story of the tower. The belfry has stone louvre openings with tracery heads on the four sides of the tower; its angles have slender stone pillars, corbel caps, and moulded gables; the four principal gables rising higher, terminate with carved finials; and the buttresses at the four angles of the tower are surmounted by octangular shafts and stone pinnacles.

ST. PETER'S CHURCH, ISLINGTON.

The spire rises immediately above the gables over the belfry; it has stone ribs up the eight angles; its altitude is divided into three parts by perforated tracery in paneled compartments, and it is surmounted by a stone pinnacle and carved finial. The west front connects itself with one side of the tower, and has a deeply recessed stone doorway in the centre, with moulded arch and tracery head, upon clustered columns, terminating with a crocketed gable and cross finial. On either side of the doorway are three niches, the central one being open, to light the inner lobbies; immediately above are three large arched openings, forming a screen, and transverse arches connect the same with the west wall of the church, the windows appearing deeply recessed at the back: this screen is terminated by the gable of the main roof, and surmounted with a cross finial, corresponding with that at the east end of the church.

The south angle of the west front is flanked by a square turret, agreeing with those of the old church; and this is surmounted by the old pinnacle, removed to make way for the new tower in the north angle. There is a subordinate door way of entrance to the staircase of the south gallery, with crocketed gable, and a lancet-headed window immediately above; a projecting bay, with angle buttresses, makes up the entire extent of the west front, the returns on the south side being carried up no higher than required for the staircase itself; while a flying arch at the same height as the parapet of the church connects the new south turret with that of the old church. A small octangular tower is connected therewith, within which is a spiral staircase leading to the children's gallery only.

The north and south transepts have triple lancet-headed windows upon the front face of each, and single windows as side lights, agreeing with those of the old church: these transepts are flanked with corresponding buttresses and parapet, the gables and roof only being at a somewhat less altitude than the main body of the church itself: the buttresses are surmounted at the angles with octangular shafts and pinnacles, and the gables with cross finial of the same character as those of the old church.

The chancel agrees generally in form and appearance with the transepts; the east window of the old church being re introduced, is larger in dimensions than those of the transepts, with the addition of a moulded arched water table over the same. The parapet and pinnacles agree with those of the transepts, but the gable terminates with a cross finial of a different form. On the north side of the chancel is a new lobby of entrance, with a lancet-headed doorway, columns, moulded arch, and plain gable. On the south side of the chancel, with plain doorway, is the vestry. The whole work throughout has been entirely cleaned down to agree with the additions, in order to make the same appear as an entirely new church.

The interior has also been thoroughly repaired and decorated. The principa lobbies of entrance in the west front and the chancel have groined roofs, with clustered columns; the chancel screen is composed of small buttresses upon corbels, with moulded compartments, tracery heads, and perforated gable and finials, the sides of the chancel being finished in a corresponding manner; the east window and side lights have narrow margins of ruby and violet coloured glass, filled in with a flowing enrichment, painted amber upon an opaque ground: the perforated gables of the chancel-screen being at the same time filled in with stained glass, and the inscriptions in illuminated characters upon a vellum-ground.

The transepts consist of two arched openings, springing from one central shaft of clustered columns in each, and corbels agreeing in form with those from whence spring the main timbers of the roof.

The roof is composed of open oaken timbers, upon pendant corbels.

The whole has been executed according to the designs and under the direction of Messrs. Gough and Roumieu, architects, Lancaster-place; the contracting builder being Mr. John Jay, of London Wall.

The church will be re-opened to-morrow, when three sermons will be preached in aid of the fund for the enlargement.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XLVI.

LORD DUDLEY STUART.

Were there any human tribunal, before which nations could be arraigned for national crimes, the kingdoms of Europe might be summoned to a bar where Poland would, as a crushed and bleeding victim, plead, "trumpet-tongued," against them. We are told by the Preacher, when we see wrong and oppression done among the children of men, to wonder not, "nor marvel at the matter." But the manner in which the European powers have permitted Poland to be annihilated, destroyed, and blotted from the list of nations, is a subject of surprise. Politically, it was as gross a blunder, as it was, morally, a glaring crime. But the history of all that led to it, and how it was achieved, is a mournful chapter in the record of human existence. "Were long to tell, and sad to trace," and we cannot here enter into it. It is sufficient to say, that, from the hour of the famous "partition of Poland" between the monarchs of Russia, Prussia, and Austria, to the bloody and obstinate struggles maintained by the Poles, in the hope of regaining a national existence, and down to the present moment, when thousands of that gallant people are eating the bitter bread of exile, the sympathy of the great body of the people in every country has been as strongly with the oppressed, as the feelings and policy of the different Governments of Europe have been with the oppressors. But, what is done, is done. Having, in common with others, permitted the injury, it is at least due to our own character, to say that we have gone considerably beyond others in alleviating its effects. This is something to the credit side of the account.

Foremost among the friends of Poland, where any exertions were to be used for the benefit of her people—deprived of home, property, and subsistence,—is now, and long has been, the subject of our sketch,—Lord Dudley Coutts Stuart, of whom it has been well said by a popular journalist, that "he is always at his post wherever the cause of charity is to be upheld, and is in his own person a chivalrous specimen of that aristocracy which holds its honours under a patent from nature herself." This is high praise, but it is not undeserved. The exertions he has made on behalf of the Poles exiled in England, have the great merit of being disinterested. The position of the advocate of an oppressed body of foreigners could give no political advancement; they had neither "vote nor influence," in any county or borough in the kingdom. It could produce nothing, could give nothing, and entailed him a great amount of toil, requiring both patience and energy. Nor is this all: from the position in which he stands towards them, his pecuniary sacrifices must have been considerable.

His lordship is the son of the first Marquis of Bute, and consequently nearly connected to the present possessor of the title. The family claims a direct descent from the House of Stuart, which gave so many sovereigns to England and Scotland—most of them gifted or amiable as individuals, but all of them unfortunate as monarchs. The name, however, has still an interest attached to it, being linked with so much of what may be called the Romance of History. The first dignity of the family appears to have been a baronetcy, conferred in 1627, and at various intervals a number of titles and grades of nobility were given to the members of it, down to the creation of the Earldom of Bute, conferred upon the immediate predecessors of the well-known minister of the last days of George the Second, and the early part of the reign of George the Third—a statesman who was better versed in botany than politics, and yet by his personal qualities acquired and maintained an influence in the Court, which for a long period enabled him to set public opinion at defiance in a true characteristic of the Stuart race), and to which the great Earl of Chatham was compelled to yield, though in talents so immeasurably his superior. The marquisate was erected in 1796. Lord Dudley Stuart was born in 1803. There are several instances of the members of what is called the "junior nobility" making for themselves a public reputation in the path of politics, or the career of arms, quite distinct from that of the elder branches of their families, who take their place in society by virtue of their hereditary right, and his lordship is one of those instances. We do not know what induced him first to turn his attention to the condition of the unfortunate Polish exiles; probably it was a feeling of sympathy for a gallant people, but it might also arise in some degree from his connection by marriage with the family of Napoleon, as Lady Stuart was the daughter of Lucien Bonaparte, Prince of Canino. It is enough to know, that having once made himself their advocate, he has performed the duties the self-imposed office involved, for a series of years, earnestly, consistently, and ably. The fugitives from the vengeance and tyranny of the Emperor Nicholas, who found an asylum in England, can alone appreciate the true value of his exertions. To these exiles, the first necessity is to provide the means of existence—no easy task in the land of the stranger—for every assistance from the connections they have left behind, is prohibited and prevented by a savage and ever-watchful jealousy. Provided with these means—scanty enough at best—by their own exertions, and the assistance of our countrymen, their next endeavour is to preserve their own nationality, which the Autocrat has used, and is using, every means in his power—and how vast that power is—to destroy. They endeavour to keep alive their language, to preserve their literature, and the political and constitutional government they formed after the revolt, which the Russians quelled with such difficulty. In all these efforts they have been assisted by the advice and advocacy of Lord Dudley Stuart. He directed into practical channels of relief, that general feeling in their favour which was created by their gallant defence, and their subsequent sufferings. And he has accomplished a yet more difficult task than this—he has kept alive that feeling, which, without some stimulus, might have died away after the first display of sympathy.

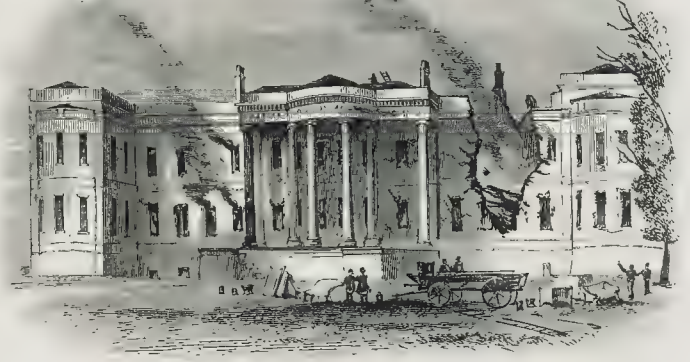
He is now as active as ever in the cause; his speech at the meeting of the Polish Ball Committee, held on Saturday last, at the Guildhall, was a very able one; we extract one passage, of which the concluding sentences derive eloquence from their general truth, as well as their expression:—

To the citizens of London, and to the powerful press of the metropolis, the Poles were under the deepest obligations. The very monotony of an annual appeal, which, in ordinary instances, was calculated to produce weariness and indifference in the public mind, produced, in their case, undertaken as it was with so much life and energy, no effects of the kind. On the contrary, the consequence had been that the cause of these poor exiles had found, in the sympathies of the British public, a humanity almost as untiring as the vengeance that persecuted their unfortunate countrymen at home. Russia remembered, and remembered to revenge, the noble stand that was made by Poland against the whole of her enormous power "Shall those," said Lord Dudley Stuart, "who once looked at that extraordinary display of valour and devotion with admiring eyes, be more forgetful than those who abhorred and feared it? Whatever may be the case with tyrants, mankind have an interest, a direct and palpable interest, in preserving the memory of such exploits. They give to the mind a greater capacity of action—they impart a more practical character to the aspirations of the highest virtue, and, plucking up the standard of human nature itself, they plant it on a nobler eminence."

This is a favourable specimen of his lordship's style, and we cannot better conclude our sketch than by expressing our hearty and cordial assent to the principle so ably embodied in words. Lord Dudley Stuart is not a prominent politician or party man. In person he is tall, with a pale complexion, well-marked features, and fair hair.



LUTON HOO—SKETCHED ON THE MORNING AFTER THE FIRE.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT LUTON HOO.

Towers, like age of man, are all betouch'd
To that false bedgroom—Time! Old Play.

When ancient Architecture a mould'ring walls,
A prey to Time, shrink from their ivy clasp,
And, vain as streamlets in their waterfalls,
Attempt a futile, ineffaceable grasp
At the calm being they enjoy'd erewhile:—
We can but own th' inexorable fate
That doth on all sub-lunar things await!
But when we see a venerable pile,
Which had outliv'd the lightning's vivid ire
For many a year, a sinless victim laid
On the vile altar of un-vestal fire,
We're half inclined to murmur and upbraid!—
But then the thought,—the consciousness that we
From birth are ruins, makes us patient be. W.

In our late edition of last week a paper we mentioned the extensive fire at this magnificent seat of the Marquis of Bute; and we now regret to add that so rapid was the work of destruction, that in the course of a few hours this superb edifice has been reduced to a mass of smoking ruins, with the exception of only a small portion of the elevation.

About 2 o'clock, on Friday morning, the under-gardener, who was asleep on the basement story, was awakened by noise, which led him at once to conclude that there was a fire, and to give an alarm to the housekeeper, Mrs. Partridge, who slept in a chamber near at hand. Mrs. Partridge instantly arose, the domestics were aroused, and messengers despatched in every direction for assistance. The labourers from Lord Bute's farm, many of the townspeople of Luton and its vicinity, all readily lent a helping hand either in endeavouring to check the flames or save endangered property. Persons were also sent with all speed to every place in the neighbourhood where a fire extinguishing engine was to be found, and, as speedily as the distance would allow, the Luton and Hinkin engines were brought to the burning mansion. Meanwhile the fire continued to rage with uncontrolled fury right and left. Mrs. Partridge seized a case-knife and called upon the men who had rushed in the passages of the mansion to follow her into the gallery, where she knew there were many most splendid and valuable paintings, and with her own hands she cut down some of them, pointing out to the persons around her those which should be first removed. Her exertions were so successful, that very few of the pictures and paintings have been lost, and those of less value as compared with those saved.

When the engines arrived, the edifice was one mass of fire; and could they have rendered any service, the only water to be got at was that of the ornamental pond, full a quarter of a mile from the mansion. It is true that there were various tanks at the top of the house in different parts, which were supplied from the same pond by means of a large main pipe, through which the water was forced in the usual way; but in the confusion of the moment some person in endeavouring to turn on the water made a mistake, and, turning the wrong way, so deranged the whole machinery that no water could be procured by the ordinary channel The unscathed portion was the library in the south wing, to save which directions were given to cut away a part of the roof and all the connecting timbers, as far as was practicable. The experiment was successful. Still, the valuable contents of this apartment were not left in jeopardy; the books, 40,000 volumes, and various curious and valuable manuscripts, having been removed.

Luton Hoo, or High Luton,—the term "Hoo" signifying "high,"—was situate between St. Alban's and Bedford, about two miles east of the town of Luton.

A great portion of the mansion was built by the Napier family, but part of it was of more ancient date. It was, however, nearly all rebuilt by John, third Earl of Bute, the first Minister of George III, who, in 1762, employed the celebrated Adams to reconcile the incongruities of the architecture, occasioned by its having been built at various times. The model adopted by the architect was the palace of Diocletian at Spalatro; and it is generally admitted that his design was worked out in a very masterly manner. Among the principal apartments, the ceilings of which were ornamented with the best efforts of the pencil of Cipriani, the library was chiefly remarkable. It was completed in 1767. Dr. Johnson, after visiting Luton Hoo with Boswell, said, "This is one of the places I do not regret having come to see. It is a very stately palace indeed. In the house magnificence is not sacrificed to convenience, nor convenience to magnificence. The library is very splendid. The dignity of the rooms is very great, and the quantity of pictures is beyond expectation—beyond hope." The east and south wings only were completed by Adams, and the present noble owner employed Smirke, who completed the other wing, and added the magnificent portico, which now stands a mere wreck, the lofty and massive Ionic columns supporting only a fragmental sheet of copper which covered the roof. That part of the building, internally, was in an unfinished state; but the east front contained the drawing-room and other elegant apartments. The wall of this part of the building was cracked from top to bottom. Here were several sculptured marble mantel-pieces and jambs, which were miraculously saved when the fire was at its fiercest height.

In the wing corresponding with that containing the library was the chapel, which was rebuilt by Smirke, in which was preserved an exceedingly fine Gothic wainscot, enriched with carving, intermingled with Latin sentences of Scripture, in ancient characters, which was first put up at Tyttenhanger, in Hertfordshire, by Sir Thomas Pope, the founder of Trinity College, Oxon, and was removed to Luton in perfect preservation by the family of Napier, to whom this estate formerly belonged. The chapel and this beautiful carving—which had been drawn and engraved by Shaw, as an example to modern architects—are, we regret to say, utterly destroyed, with the exception of half of the richly carved oak door and the altar, which is of the same material, and fashioned after the model of the Jewish ark of the covenant. The beautiful altar-piece, the Last Supper, by Schiavone, from the convent of Venice, was also destroyed. The communion plate, however, together with sundry old deeds and papers, were saved, including the deed of consecration, dated A.D. 1674.

The paintings in the gallery, of which but few were injured or burnt, form a most valuable collection, and their loss would have been irreparable. They comprise several masterpieces by Raphael, Titian, Rubens, the Carracci, Correggio, Guyp, &c. There also is a fine collection of portraits, among which are the celebrated Earl of Strafford, General Ireton, Pym, Lord Chancellor Jeffries, Ben Jonson, Dr. Samuel Johnson, and also a portrait of Earl Bute, the Prime Minister, one of Sir Joshua Reynolds's early pictures. Amongst others preserved two deserve especial notice, the one, "A Virgin and Child," by Raphael, and the other, "A Scene near Maestricht," by Cuyp, which, par excellence, is called "The Cuyp." These and a few others are understood to have been insured to an immense amount.

The contents of the grand entrance hall, however, were lost, including several fine paintings, among which may be mentioned full-length portraits of George II., George III., and Queen Charlotte, by Hylmore; and the late Earl of Bute and FIRE BRIGADIER.

Lady Wortley Montagu, by Sir Joshua Reynolds; also some remarkable models of Athenian and other Grecian ruins, as well as a collection of antiques of various descriptions.

The relative advantages of cast and wrought-iron girders for building purposes have been clearly shown by the present catastrophe. While with one exception the cast-iron girders are still supporting the enormous masses of brickwork forming the cross walls, in the instance of a wrought-iron truss bridge girder, which pinned the central to the eastern front wall, it has expanded from the heat, and carried with it not only the central wall, but brought out a portion of the eastern front, rendering it positively necessary to take down the whole.

The Marquis of Bute was at Cardiff castle. An express was despatched to his Lordship announcing the catastrophe

It is difficult to say at present what is the amount of damage sustained, but there is no doubt that it far exceeds the insurance. In the Sun fire-office the house and offices were insured for £10,000, the household goods for £10,000, the pictures and prints for £10,500, and the stables for £2000: total £32,500. In the Phœnix office, the household goods, for £10,000. In the Royal Exchange-office the pictures and prints for £9450, the china and glass for £1000; total, £10,450. Gross total, £52,950.

Mr. Tonks, the surveyor to the Sun Fire-office, has estimated the cost of restoring the building at between £30,000 and £40,000 The noble Marquis succeeded to the estate about 25 years since. The Marchioness of Bute died about two years ago. Her ladyship was always much attached to Luton Hoo as a residence

The pictures have suffered considerable injury from hasty removal, and some of the sculptured marbles lying upon the lawn had been chipped. The monument of the great botanical work, by the first Earl of Bute, was seen flying about the lawn in separate leaves, but they have all been collected and secured. A considerable number of the most valuable books, printings, and engravings were, until a late hour on Friday evening, lying about on the damp grass; and from the hasty manner in which they were removed, and from being thrown from the windows, they must have sustained great injury.

The library, which is uninjured, though, of course, in great confusion, being filled with piles of furniture of all kinds, as are the stables also, comprised three rooms, the entire length 146 feet, and was considered inferior only to that of Blenheim

The plate, the wine, and portions of costly property, including two curious and ingenious automatons, richly jewelled, and acting like an orrery, were also saved

The mansion stood in its pride on an eminence in Luton Hoo Park, which was laid out by the celebrated "Capability Brown;" and a few years ago it had been greatly enlarged and embellished. It was equal to most of the aristocratical mansions of England; and, to the eye of the visitor who was permitted to walk round the park, was a most commanding and magnificent object. The river Lea runs through the grounds in a circuitous and picturesque manner, forming in its progress two extensive sheets of water. The once noble and elegant mansion, which formerly completed the beauty of the scene, now presents a melancholy spectacle, blackened, dismantled, and fast falling into ruins. Upon the origin of the calamity it is not easy to give or ascertain any positive opinion. The supposition is that it was caused by some embers which had been left on the roof of the hall, where some plumbers were at work, and had a fire, on the preceding Wednesday.

COMPLIMENTARY ODE TO MRS. PARTRIDGE.

Tenuous perdrix
If such we see!

Oh! what a duck Mrs. Partridge you were,
In spite
Of your fright
And the general flare,
To take a one knife,
At the risk of your life,
And set out the paintings
(Without any misgivings)
And fast in your grope
Hold Raphael and Rapp,
Carracci and Rubens,—
And, very much Jubens
(Latin's convenient exquisite)
To save a fine Titian
What has so every Grecian.—
Zounds—Apollo,
Pa tenuous and fellows
Whose outlandish names will not rhyme!

A Lorraine
Most gen ine
Are you, dear Mrs. Partridge!
What would you not for living man have done,
When for the portraits of the dead you flew
On wings of thought to the you sought
To fly from a ball-cartridge!
Say, are you "lorded dame" or "widow fresh to woo"
No matter—
In foreign patter
Brava! we'll say, (or Brava feminæ,— Applause should not be always masculine)
But few would e'er have had the nous
To be so cool when all the house
Was burning hot around you!
The flames did not astound you,
But serv'd as light
Of bonfires bright
To show you where
The jewels were!
Long life to you, brave Mrs. P.,
Many a happy day to see,
In Luton Hoo when it is rebuilt,
And in the hall
The pictures all
Again are hung in frames new gilt!

THE FIRE BRIGADIER.

The very frequent occurrence of destructive conflagrations at this season of the year, renders it a fitting opportunity for illustrating one of the most ingenious and useful contrivances which modern science has devised for the rescue of life and property from fire.

The origin of "a fire" is usually found in some hidden point of combustion, capable, were its existence known, of being immediately extinguished; and even the first dawn of a "great fire" is, ordinarily, confined to circumscribed limits, which would admit, in themselves, of a similarly easy conquest. To discover the latent cause of "fire," and to carry a hose of water to its heart, has, in consequence, become the first duty of a fireman; and we are happy in being able to show our readers how admirably Mr. Braidwood and his famous brigade excel in the almost daily habit of performing this perilous but important service.

The first object is for the brigadier to secure protection against smoke. This is effected by a tube, connected with an air-pump, attached to the engine, on the outside of the building on fire.

Secondly, Protection against heat or flames is secured by a stout leather dress and hood.

Thirdly, Provision for light and sight is made by a powerful reflecting lantern on the breast, and a pair of thickly-glazed sight-holes in the hood.

Fourthly, Provision is made for communication, by a shrill whistle, attached to the hood.

Thus equipped, the bold fireman seeks the sleeping family—the invaluable ledger—the smouldering bale—the hidden spark and he seldom fails in rescuing the one, or in extinguishing the other.

When we recollect, that in the metropolis alone, 700 fires frequently occur in one year, the importance of the above invention will at once be acknowledged by every reader.

The protective dress is the invention of Mr. Braidwood, the indefatigable superintendent of the London Fire Establishment, who, for the purpose of testing the practical worth of the contrivance, had a number of experimental fires made in the vaults of the head-quarters of the brigade in Watling-street; and, by such indefatigable study, has perfected the invention. The dress was used with perfect success in rescuing three children from a fire in Fetter-lane, on Sunday evening last. About three weeks since, a brigadier wearing one of these dresses, was enabled to extinguish a smouldering fire of great extent in the stock-rooms of Mr King, the printer, on College-hill.

PRESENT TO HER MAJESTY FROM VISCOUNT COMBERMERE.—A splendid specimen of the Brahmin ox, purchased by Viscount Combermere in Hindostan, just previously to the departure of his lordship from India for England, arrived at Windsor in a closed van, a few days since, as a present to her Majesty from the noble viscount. This extraordinary animal is a favourite variety of the Indian bullock, and is the same species of animal which is worshipped by the superstitious and idolatrous Hindoos and the Brahmins of the country whence it was shipped. In consequence of its natural vicissitudes, it was considered highly dangerous to give it its liberty, to herd with the other cattle belonging to the Queen, and it was determined that it should be slaughtered.

CHINESE COLLECTION.—On Monday this unique exhibition was re-opened to the public, after being closed for a fortnight, to allow of cleaning, and some additions and improvements. More light has been admitted for the day exhibition; and at night some of the stupendous lanterns are lit with gas, so that their superb designs are shown with great brilliancy. Among the novelties we noticed a beautiful gilt sea-cattle of Confucius, whose head is a tree for the phrenologist. The price of admission to the collection has been reduced; but this has not been done through any want of success; for we assured by the curator that the exhibition has been visited by 180,000 persons, at half-a-crown each: and of the catalogue upwards of eighty editions have been sold. Nevertheless, the reduced price will, no doubt, extend the entertainment and instruction to be derived from a visit to the collection.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE CENSUS.—We have to thank numerous subscribers and correspondents for their favourable opinion of our Census Supplement, and, at the same time, to assure them that we shall spare no expense to bring forward, from time to time, such useful information as will gratify our readers, and insure the same favourable reception from the public. We shall continue to print new editions, and copies may be ordered of all booksellers and newsvenders in the United Kingdom, or by order direct to our publisher. Correspondents should bear in mind that being charged as a supplement to our paper, it may be forwarded by post TO ALL PARTS OF THE WORLD FREE OF POSTAGE. We are confident that no work has ever been produced of such extent and labour at the price, and we are grateful to be able to state that the Government and public departments have expressed their favourable opinion of our arduous undertaking, and their astonishment that the details of a Parliamentary document, exceeding 900 pages, could have been compressed into the limits of sixteen, and in such a convenient form for reference.

The population of Sheerness, in the county of Kent, is included with the return for the parish of Minster-in-Sheppey. The Government report does not give a return of the population of Sheerness.

The population of the town of West Cowes, in the Isle of Wight (which contains 4107 inhabitants), is included in the return for the parish of North-wood, in which it is situate.

Our correspondent who inquires "Who is the solitary inhabitant of the parish of Aldrington, near Brighton?" will find his inquiry answered in our last week's number, where we have given a view of the ruins of Aldrington Church

"Gildas."—We have never heard the name pronounced otherwise than Seedmon.

"X."—We do not see that any good would arise from inserting it.

"A Subscriber," on the conditions specified in his note, we consider, would be safe in shooting rabbits. The communication contains but one question.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1843.

The first discovery of an evil seldom reveals the full extent of it. The more it is enquired into, the deeper it is found to go. The first case is but striking on the vein that leads the explorer to a knowledge that there exists an amount of it beyond even his fears. Some time has elapsed since the first exposure of the dreadful state of destitution in which the makers of "cheap clothing" exist in this metropolis—if it is not almost a mockery to call their condition a state of existence at all; it might with more justice be named a condition of permanent suffering. Every week, as it passes, reveals the hideousness of the system. Since our last the reports of the police offices have exhibited additional confirmation of what, alas! did not require confirming—that avarice is always ready to take advantage of misery, and turn to profit the stern necessities of distress. Several of these cases have been again brought forward, in which females undertaking to do work for the "cheap clothing establishments" have been compelled, by that necessity which the adage tells us has no law, to pawn the goods entrusted to them, the alternative being the sacrifice of honesty or the preservation of life—or of what is more prized than life itself. There can be no question that a violation of the law has, in these cases, been committed; but it not seldom happens that human laws are placed in direct opposition to human feelings; in some of these cases the magistrates have refused to convict—have given the persons implicated time to redeem the goods, and, as the promise made with the full intention of fulfilling it has failed, from the utter impossibility of finding the means of doing so, this has again given rise to scenes more harrowing than, we hope, the great bulk of our readers can conceive: it is in these sort of cases that truth is sterner as well as stranger than fiction can ever dare to be. And what is the remedy for all this? It must be found; unless all Christian feeling and Christian charity must be supposed to be departed from among us. On this part of the subject we have received a letter which we willingly publish, both for the sake of the sentiments it breathes, and of the plan which it propounds, which are worthy of every consideration. It is written by a nobleman, whose zeal for the cause of those "who have none to help them," reflects lustre on the order to which he belongs, and whose name we only refrain from giving in deference to his own wish that it should not appear. As we have his permission to make what use we please of his communication, we give it entire, deeming it the very best thing we can do for the cause of humanity, to make such sentiments as public as possible—the following is the letter—

Nov. 16th, 1843.

SIR,—As you have exerted yourself with so much zeal, talent, and humanity, to bring prominently forward the situation of those unfortunate semi-stressed, whose case has of late so prominently occupied public attention, I take the liberty of addressing you, in order to make a suggestion on the subject, and should it meet with your concurrence, you will know how to avail yourself of the circulation of your journal, in order to draw attention to it. The evil, no doubt, arises from the cupidity of the shopkeepers taking undue advantage of the great competition in the labour market, encouraged by the distressed consumer, driven by necessity, to purchase as cheaply as he can, though in too many cases it is to be feared, by those customers whose appetite for cheapening induces them to overlook all other considerations, in order to indulge the propensity. Our best political economists, I believe, concur in opinion, that legislative interference with the remuneration of labour always fails in effecting its object, and sometimes aggravates the evils it was meant to allay. If this be true, we must, in this case, look elsewhere for means of doing good. You, sir, and the press generally, can be, as you have already been, of untold service, by exposing each case of oppression as it arises, with names, dates, and numbers, to public indignation, and by endeavouring to create a more humane and Christian feeling on the subject. But there is a way, with the beneficial effects of which I am perfectly conversant, and which, if followed, all over London, would, it appears to me, go far to alleviate this misery, the existence of which is so degrading to our country, and so offensive to Divine Providence—it is the formation of district visiting societies all over London. They exist already in the in-wards of St. George's, Hanover square, in parts of Marylebone, Paddington, and Westminster, and they are to be found partially scattered over the rest of the metropolis. There is also a society called, I think, Central, and of which the Duke of Buccleuch and Sir Thomas Baring is president, which assists in the formation of new ones, by giving those printed rules and regulations which have been found to answer well elsewhere. The defect of many of these societies is, that not being the constituents of a Christian of all denominations in the entire district, but simply an association of a few benevolent persons belonging to some church or chapel, the benefit is, in a great measure, restricted to a particular congregation; unfortunately, I am also aware, they are, with few exceptions, only to be found in the wealthier portions of the town.

The difficulties are, no doubt, great, that stand in the way of the establishment of such societies in the neglected and destitute haunts of wretchedness. The rich inhabitants likely to contribute much are few; the crowded, dirty, unwholesome, reeking tenements most unwilling to the visitor. Still, we ever trust, have been attempted, invariably with the Divine Blessing, they have rarely failed, even under the most unpromising circumstances. They will be aided by the London City Mission, the Strangers' Friend, the Accident Relief, and other societies. The great advantage which the visiting system possess, is that, without interfering with the legitimate operation of the Poor-law, they step in to help the honest and industrious, struggling with misfortune. They find out, and bring to light the atrocious cases of inflicting oppression which you have lately published; and they can try what remonstrance with the employer will do, under fear of exposure. They are a great check upon imposition of all sorts, especially that thriving trade of begging-letter-writing; because, when once a district visiting society is known to exist, if A receives a begging-letter, he at once refers it to the society's committee, who have charge of the district. Nor can they ever bring travelling beggars, as it is a rule of these societies to have nothing to do with casual poor

I speak most confidently, when I assert, that if those who are able, in these unhappy districts, will only laying aside all distinctions of religious creed—form visiting associations, such as I have described, carefully apportioning visitors to each locality, many in the more fortunately situated quarters of the metropolis will be happy to assist, when called upon; and they will do that towards stemming the fearful amount of misery, wretchedness, and crime, which no law can possibly effect, nor any public appeals, however eloquent, however combined, however constant.

I remain, Sir, your most obedient servant,

Whatever may be the view which party politicians may take of the state of Ireland at the present moment, there is but one light in which the philosophic advocates of civilization can regard it, and this is one of unmitigated horror.

Atrocities, from which society must shrink back both with disgust and indignation, mark her daily existence as a nation; and it is impossible not to feel that continuous misgovernment, under both Whig and Tory administrations, has produced this deplorable condition. One day we have as journalists to record the succession of outrages by which the Marquis of Waterford has been driven from the county in which his presence and his hospitality might have been productive of such extensive good. And within a few hours we have again to record a disgraceful and heartless crime, of such terrific character that scarcely any terms are strong enough to express our natural abhorrence of its atrocity.

On the evening of November 13, several men broke into the dwelling of Mr. Thomas Waller, of Finnoe House, Tipperary, and surprised the family while sitting round their fire after dinner. They instantly began a murderous attack upon the family and a Captain Braddle, who was a visitor in the house. They defended themselves as well as they could; but, being without arms, were of course overpowered by the number of their assailants. Miss Vereker (the sister of Mrs. Waller) is not expected to survive, and Mrs. Waller is in little better condition. Mr. Waller's arm was broken in two places, and he was also severely wounded in the head. On hearing the sound of approaching assistance, the dastardly assailants made off. Comment upon this outrage would be superfluous. We can understand that class of malice which makes man its victim, but we confess ourselves unable to understand that from which women are the sufferers. Mr. Waller may have personally aroused the indignation of the people, but his wife and sister-in-law could not surely have made themselves personally hateful to those by whom the dastardly assault was committed. Nay, had they done so, they should not surely have been the sufferers from it. Here is, indeed, an intervention called for from the strong arm of the law. Such cases admit of no palliation. Whatever may have been the past or present misgovernment of the country, in this instance the sufferers have exhibited themselves in the light of savages, and as such ought to be visited with the well-merited execration of those who might, perhaps in silence, have sympathised with the wild justice of revenge which only wreaked itself upon the males of the class at whose hands it conceived itself to suffer wrong.

IRELAND.

We subjoin extracts from the letters of our reporters and artists who have gone to Ireland for the purpose of affording our readers illustrations of the stirring scenes at present taking place in the Irish capital. They write in confident terms of the attractive nature of the treat which they will enable us to offer to the public, and no exertion shall be spared in the furtherance of the object of their mission. The tone of impartiality which characterizes our journal, shall be preserved in the prosecution of our design, and all that is interesting, without reference to parties or positions, shall be made the subjects of vivid delineation. The engravings alluded to in those extracts, will appear in our paper of next week.

DUBLIN, Nov. 15, 1843.

Last night we were with the solicitors of the accused—celebrated men of mark on this side of the water—whose likenesses are all taken. To-day we were at the Recorder's Court, where the jury list cases came off; and here your artist was amongst the bar, affording great mirth by the graphic and extraordinary fidelity with which he got through every face. So thoroughly good-natured was the reception which we received, that the High Sheriff himself put himself in the position he was asked to do, in order that his physiognomy (a very fine one) might be done the more justice to. Your artist has done, in addition to these portraits, a fine sketch of the court, with all the characters therein this morning, grouped as they appeared. We have also been to the corporation, where we took the Lord Mayor and a few of the chief civic orders; then to the grand scene of action, Conciliation Hall, a later period of the day, namely, the Queen's Bench: and before the proceedings commenced, we were absolutely in the private consulting room of the accused parties, their counsel, and solicitors. Dan, most good-humouredly enjoyed the thing, and said, "Is this a painter we've got amongst us?" His likeness as he stood, the only person amidst the group with his hat on, is admirable. It is, indeed, to the very life. Barrett's, is equally good; Steele's, ditto: in fact, I scarcely know to what portion of the artist's work to give the preference. We then went into court, where scarcely any one but the bar could obtain standing room. We have taken Dublin after a manner—very seldom. Every place is open to us, the entrance to which no money, under ordinary circumstances of such business, could purchase. Old friendship, and Irish good nature, have done wonders in this matter. The name of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is in everybody's mouth, and thousands upon thousands of the Irish will be on the look out for the number which is to contain the all-interesting sketches.

The Dublin evening press has come out in your praise; and, mentioning your artists by name (which is a tower of strength) connected with the undertaking, the greatest excitement has been raised to see the result, and the popularity of your journal is certain.

(From another Reporter.)

You will see by ——'s parcel that we have made a glorious début in the Irish metropolis. Anything to equal the correctness of the portraits I have never seen in my life in fact they beat H. hollow, without any partiality or favour. To my pleasure surprise, everybody here is as familiar with the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS as I am myself. Every man that we approached, high or low, rich or poor, official, semi-official, and disinterested spectator, all vied with each other in doing the agreeable. We were at the Green-street Court-house at half-past eight in the morning, on a very interesting occasion regarding the jury lists, and made an admirable hit of the likenesses. At twelve o'clock we were before the Lord Mayor and Corporation of Dublin in public assembly sketching away. These portraits were the astonishment of every one who beheld the originals living, moving, and being, at the very moment that the pencil of the artist transferred them to paper. At two o'clock we were with the accused, Mr. O'Connell having kindly put himself in a position for a sketch; and when you see it, I think you will confess that it is admirable. Mr. Steele's and Mr. Barrett's are equally good; but, in fact, all are excellent. The principal part of the business comes off to-morrow morning. Of course you can do nothing with them this week, but you cannot promise too much for next week.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR.—On Monday, her Majesty, accompanied by the Princess of Hohenlohe Langenbourg, took an early walk in the precincts of the Castle. At nine o'clock his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by his Royal Highness the Duke de Nemours, went to the Royal preserves to enjoy the sport of shooting. The two Princes were attended by General Colbert, Mr. G. E. Anson, Colonel Wylde, and the Hon. C. A. Murray. His Royal Highness Prince Albert honoured Mr. Wynn, R.A., of the Royal Mint, with a sitting for a medal of his Royal Highness.

TUESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert took their usual walk this morning in the grounds of the Castle. Her Majesty, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and attended by both the equerries in waiting, took equestrian exercise in the riding-school. The Queen went to the school and returned to the Castle in carriages, and the Princes rode on horseback.

WEDNESDAY.—Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess de Nemours returned to the Castle to lunch. Their royal highnesses travelled by the Great Western Railway to the Slough station, and were received by the royal equipages from the station to the Castle. The suite in attendance on the duke and duchess consisted of the Countess d'Orvaison, le General Colbert, le Capitaine Reille, and the Hon. C. A. Murray. After luncheon Prince Albert, accompanied by the Duke de Nemours, went to the royal preserves to enjoy the sport of shooting. The Princes were attended by Col. Wylde, Mr. G. E. Anson, and the Hon. C. A. Murray. The illustrious party afterwards returned to the Castle. Her Majesty, accompanied by her Royal Highness the Duchess de Nemours, and her Serene Highness the Princess Hohenlohe Langenbourg, and attended by the Hon. Miss Murray, took a carriage airing in the park. Lord Byron Col. Barkley, and Col. Berkeley Drummond, accompanying her Majesty and her illustrious visitors on horseback. Their Excellencies Count and Countess de St. Aulaire, the Duke of Wellington, the Earl of Aberdeen, and Major General Sir George Scovell have arrived at the Castle on a visit to her Majesty.

Lord and Lady Stanley of Alderley arrived at their residence in St. James's square from Alderley Hall, Lancashire.

ARUNDEL CASTLE.—The Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, with Lord Edward Howard and Lady Mary Howard, returned to the Castle on Thursday week, from the Rookery, Dorking and intend to remain here until after Christmas. Mr. and Lady Stanley, Sir John and Lady Peshel, Miss Burdett Coutts, Mr. and Mrs Powell, Colonel Wyndham, and a select circle, are assembled on a visit to their Grace the Duke and Duchess. In the course of the last three days the gentlemen of the party have had excellent sport in shooting over the preserves attached to the domain.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Ailesbury have been receiving a succession of visitors at their seat, Tottenham Park, near Marlborough. The Earl and Countess of Jersey, the Duke and Duchess of Beaufort, the Earl and Countess of Shrewsbury, Lord Wilton, Lord and Lady Ernest Bruce, Earl and Countess Bruce, Colonel and Mrs. Montague, Count De Noailles, Baron Talleyrand, Lord Alfred Paget, Mr. Baring, Baron Neumann, Mr. Hamilton Fane, Viscount and Countess de St. Aulaire, Corp. Sir August is Foster, &c., have been among the guests assembled. The noble Marquis and Marchioness propose to pass the winter at Paris.

The Earl of Aberdeen arrived in town on Wednesday from Arundel Castle.

THE HEALTH OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.—It is expected that his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, whose health, we regret to state, is not so good as could be wished, will very shortly be taken to Brighton, in the hope that the sea breeze and change of air may be beneficial to the heir apparent.

M. de Berryer returned to Mivart's Hotel on Tuesday evening from Alton Towers, where that celebrated avocat has been staying with the Earl and Countess of Shrewsbury, during the visit of his Royal Highness the Duke of Bordeaux.

The Queen, through the Lord Chamberlain, caused invitations to be issued on Tuesday, to the Duke of Wellington, Earl of Aberdeen, Count and Countess de St. Aulaire, Sir Robert Peel, Duke of Devonshire, Earl of Jersey, and a long list of the leading nobility in town, to assemble at Windsor to meet the Duke and Duchess de Nemours. The circle is understood to be invited until Monday next, when it will separate.

HAMILTON PALACE.—The Duke and Duchess of Hamilton, accompanied by the Marquis and Marchioness of Douglas and the Countess of Lincoln, are expected to leave the palace this week in the ensuing month, for Holyrood Palace, where the accouchement of the Marchioness is expected to take place at the end of December. His Grace is expected to return to town, where Lady Anne Hamilton, the Duke's sister, formerly lady in waiting to Queen Caroline, is passing the winter in town.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUC DE BORDEAUX.—His Royal Highness took his departure on Sunday morning from Alton Towers, the seat of the Earl of Shrewsbury, for Sheffield, to inspect the manufactures of that town. After a visit to the mines of the Duke of Bridgewater, the illustrious Prince goes on to Leeds. His Royal Highness will proceed on Friday to Burton Constable, near Hull, on a visit to Lady Clifford. The royal and noble party is now dispersed During the stay of the Duc de Bordeaux, the society was constantly changing, and his Royal Highness had thus the opportunity of meeting several persons of the highest rank, without distinction of party, members both of the House of Peers and House of Commons, an intercourse which evidently left favourable impressions on both sides After the cloth had been removed on Sunday, the Earl of Shrewsbury rose to propose the health of the Prince in the following terms:—"I thank your Royal Highness for the honour you have done me by passing a few days at Alton Towers, for the kindness which you have manifested, and for the amiable manner in which you have received every guest who has been here. I need scarcely assure you with what fervour and sincerity we shall pray to God to bless your future prospects (leur voire etrenr)." Monseigneur le Duc de Bordeaux replied: "I feel most acutely the kind language which has just been addressed to me. I have been quite delighted to pass some days at Alton Towers, and I shall never forget the happy hours I have spent here."

GRAND ENTERTAINMENT AT THE FRENCH EMBASSY.—On Tuesday evening his Excellency the French Ambassador and Countess de Saint Aulaire gave a magnificent banquet at their splendid residence in Grosvenor square, to the elite of the distinguished persons at the table were—their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess de Nemours, and the Duke of Cambridge, Prince d'Oettingen Wallerstein, his Excellency the Duke de Palmella, Sir Robert Peel, the Earl of Aberdeen, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Wharncliffe, Sir James Graham, his Excellency the Turkish Ambassador, his Excellency Baron Neumann, Austrian Minister, his Excellency Count Brunnow, Russian Minister; his Excellency Baron Rehmassegge, Hanoverian Minister; his Excellency Baron de Cetto, Bavarian Minister; his Excellency M. Van der Weyer, Belgian Minister; General Colbert, Captain de Reille, and Countess de Orvaison. Covers were laid for the Duke and Duchess de Nemours; Baron Knesebeck, in attendance on the Duke of Cambridge; Count Rohan de Chabot, Count de Noailles, de la Belinaye, Baron Talleyrand, &c. The Duke of Wellington and Lord Stanley, who were invited, were prevented from joining the circle. The Countess de St. Aulaire had a soirée in the latter part of the evening.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—At the British Embassy, at Vienna, on the 1st of November, by the chaplain to the embassy, the Earl of Shelburne, to the Hon. Emily Elphinstone de Flahault, eldest daughter of the Comte de Flahault, French ambassador at Vienna, and the Baroness Flahault.

KING LEOPOLD'S BOUNTY.—On Monday week, according to annual custom his Majesty's donation of £100 in useful clothing, to the poor of Esher and the neighbouring villages, was given on the anniversary of the death of the much-lamented Princess Charlotte. The poor people assembled in the national school-room, and received the clothing through the clergymen of their respective parishes.

On Tuesday at eleven o'clock, his Grace the Duke of Wellington arrived from Walmer Castle, to preside over a Dover Harbour Sessions. The noble Duke was received by a party of honour, and entered the Harbour house under a salute from the guns at the heights. His Grace looked uncommonly well. We understand that application from a committee appointed at a meeting of the inhabitants of Dover, for the purchase of a piece of property lying on the harbour ground, was acceded to. An application for the purchase of harbour land for the erection of new houses, was made by the South Eastern Railway Company. This application, we learn, was not granted—at least, the purchase of the ground as freehold was not agreed to by the Harbour Board, though no objection was made to the railway company erecting houses on the harbour leases, similar to the other hotels of the place. At two o'clock the noble duke left Dover, under a salute from the garrison, and proceeded by the South Eastern Railway to London.

The Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch have had a constant succession of visitors at Drumsheugh Castle, and are now leaving for Dalkeith Palace, where they will remain several weeks before proceeding to Broughton House, near Kettering, at which seat the noble duke will pass a portion of the hunting season.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD, Nov. 11.—An election was holden yesterday, at Lincoln College when the following were chosen:—Fellow—The Rev. Wm. Boutfield, of the Society. Scholars—E. J. Howard, of King's College; J. Peach, Durham School. Exhibitioners—W. Slatter, of the same College; T. H. Tristram, Durham School; Geo. Searle Magdalen Hall.

It has been agreed in convocation to grant out of the University chest the sum of £500 towards the National Fund, in aid of the establishment and support of schools in the manufacturing and mining districts.

DURHAM, Nov. 11.—At a meeting of the ratepayers holden on Thursday last, the following gentlemen were elected Fellows of the University of Durham:—The Rev. John Edmunds, B.A.; Walker Featherstonehaugh, B.A.; John Robertson Sumner, B.A.

The Rev. William Clarke King, M.A., of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, has been admitted ad eundem.

The Ecclesiastical Commission for England had a meeting on Tuesday after noon. The commissioners present were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Rochester, the Lord President of the Council, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Judge of the Prerogative Court, the Earl of Devon, and the Dean of Westminster.

POLICE.

MANSION HOUSE.—On Monday the Lord Mayor took the chair for the first time since he was sworn in as chief magistrate, and stated that he should punctually sit for the despatch of public business at twelve o'clock daily. He had been given to understand that the hour he named for commencing the duties of the justice-room was likely to be more convenient than any other for the performance of the ministerial business, and he gave notice that he should expect the punctual attendance of prosecutors and witnesses at the time he should take the chair.

LAMBETH-STREET.—DISTRESSING CASE OF ATTEMPTED MURDER AND SUICIDE.—Michael Hatfield, the unfortunate man who has been in custody for ten days on a charge of first attempting to murder his son Henry, a boy of five years of age, by stabbing him in the breast with a penknife, and then cutting his own throat, was again brought before Mr. Henry for final examination. The wretched man seemed a little better than when last examined, but was still in a miserable condition, and was accommodated with a seat in the dock. It will be recollected from the evidence that was given on the former occasion, and by

THE DUBLIN STATE TRIALS.

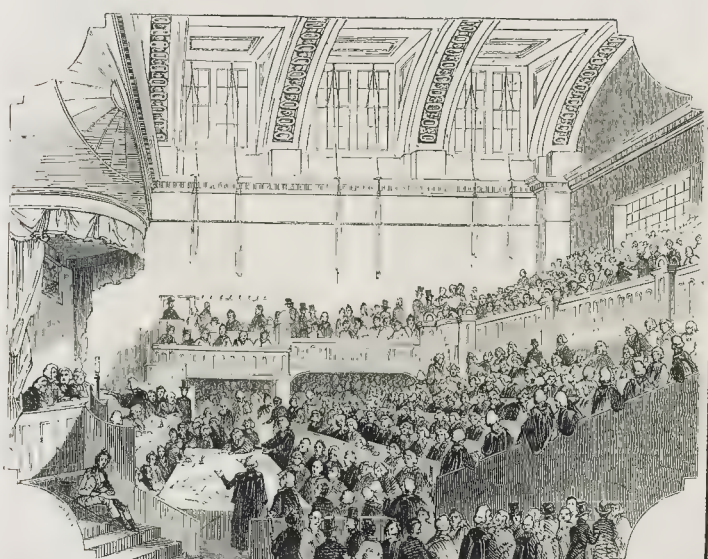
SIGNING THE BAIL BONDS AT JUDGE BURTON'S CHAMBERS.

We this week commence our illustrations of these eventful proceedings, which are now absorbing so large a share of public interest.

Our first engraving represents the interior of Judge Burton's residence, on Stephen's Green. The parties having assembled in a beautifully-decorated drawing-room, proceeded thence to his lordship's study, where the bail-bonds were signed; Mr. O'Connell, in attempting to sign, making the characteristic remark, "This pen was not made for the purpose of writing."—(See No. 77 of our journal.) Judge Burton is seated in the library-chair; nearly opposite him is Mr. D. O'Connell; next to him is Mr. John O'Connell; and at the left-hand angle of the table is Mr. Thomas Steele.

The next illustration shows the interior of the Court of Queen's Bench, at Dublin, with the general arrangement of the bench, the bar, and the crowded galleries.

In the adjoining column is represented the exterior of Mr. Daniel O'Connell's residence, in Merrion-square; it has a plain brick front.



INTERIOR OF THE QUEEN'S BENCH COURT, DUBLIN.

The next engraving shows the interior of the Grand Jury Room with the examination of Mr. F. B. Hughes, by the jury. (See No. 78, of our journal.)

We shall, next week, resume our illustrations with a series of portraits, &c.

The proceedings preliminary to the trial of the state traversers continue to excite the most intense interest, and to form the all-engrossing topic of conversation in this country, as well as, indeed, to a considerable degree throughout the empire. Notwithstanding the dry and technical nature of the proceedings hitherto, they are watched with the deepest anxiety, and the Court of Queen's Bench is each day thronged with eager listeners.

In our last publication it was stated that the Attorney-General had announced his intention of sending up fresh bills against four of the parties already indicted. This intention, however, for some unexplained reason, was not carried out. On Saturday, Mr. Whiteside, in the case of the Queen against Duffy, moved that a copy of the indictment, including the witnesses' names, and all the endorsements on the back of the original, should be delivered to his client, Mr. C. G. Duffy, proprietor of the Nation.—The Attorney-General opposed the application, which, after a long legal argument, the Court decided not to grant.—Mr. M'Donough, Queen's Counsel, then applied, in the case of the Queen against the Rev. P. J. Tyrrell, that a copy of the caption of the indictment should be delivered to his client's attorney, or that his copy of the indictment should be completed by the addition of the caption to it. [The caption is a preamble which is prefixed to the bill of indictment after the latter has been found by the Grand Jury, and it consists of a statement of the "style" and composition of the tribunal in which the bill has been found.]—This motion was in like manner opposed on the part of the Crown, and a lengthened argument ensued, which was resumed on Monday, and which resulted in the refusal of the application. Justice Perrin dissented from his brother justices in the decision.—The court then adjourned.

It is currently reported on the part of the defence that one of the traversers has no fewer than 30,000 witnesses to bring forward; and by way of further procrastinating the proceedings, it is said that ten nadies for bills of particulars have been served, one for each traverser respectively, upon which the arguments raised upon the right of each of them will, as a matter of necessity, have to be answered by the counsel for the Crown.

On Tuesday the pleas of Messrs. D. O'Connell, John O'Connell, T. Steele, G. G. Duffy, John Gray, T. M. Ray, Rev. P. J. Tyrrell, Rev. C. T. Tierney, and R. Barret, were handed into the court. The plea of Mr. Daniel O'Connell was read; it was a plea of abatement, on the ground that by the statute of the 56th of George III. the witnesses examined before the Grand Jury who found the bill ought to have been sworn in open court, and were not. Mr. O Connell pleaded "not guilty" to every point of the indictment, and said that he ought not to be compelled to answer it, and that it ought to be quashed, because the Grand Jury had found a true bill upon the evidence of adverse persons who had not been sworn in open court in accordance with the provisions of the statute already named, being an act to regulate the proceedings of Grand Juries in Ireland. This he further said he was ready to verify, and therefore prayed the judgment of the Court on the same indictment.

The Attorney General immediately rose, and called upon the Court to allow him until the next morning to look into his plea more fully.

The Chief Justice asked Mr. Ford, (Mr. O'Connell's attorney) if a similar plea had been entered on behalf of the other traversers.—Mr. Ford: Yes, my Lord similar plea has been tendered on behalf of each.

MR. O'CONNELL'S RESIDENCE, MERRION SQUARE, DUBLIN.

Mr. Henn, Queen's Counsel, begged to remind their Lordships that the time o pleading would have elapsed that night, and consequently before to-morrow, and submitted, that if the Court determined that the delay should be granted to the Attorney-General, their pleas should be entered on that day.—The Attorney General repeated the circumstances were quite at the discretion of the Court, and whether or not the matter should be discussed to-morrow.—Mr. Whiteside, Queen's Counsel (for traversers), made some objections; and was followed by Mr Henn, who said that any cause of delay arising would be from the Attorney General's conceiving it to be necessary to serve a notice of motion. The Lord Chief Justice: I do not anticipate any objection on either side; but as a member of this Court, I do say that 4 o'clock is not a proper time to enter into this matter.—Their Lordships then rose, and the Court adjourned to to-morrow. The course taken by the counsel for the defence appeared to take the law officers of the Crown by surprise, as it seemed to be generally understood that there would be an application for an extension of time to plead.

WEDNESDAY.—The deepest interest was exhibited to-day about the courts during the discussion of a motion of the Attorney-General, that the pleas tendered yesterday by the traversers should not be received, as they were not within the prescribed time. This motion has been refused, but it does not affect the main question respecting the validity of the pleas.

The Attorney-General afterwards rose and tendered, on behalf of the Crown, a demurrer to the plea. This was resisted by Mr. Moore, as being unprecedented.

The Court agreed with Mr. Moore, and declared that the usual practice should be observed.

The result is, that a notice will be served this evening, and the demurrer argued on Saturday next.

The effect of these proceedings is, that the trials cannot possibly come on the next after sittings. And if the plea should be allowed, the indictment will be quashed for the present time.

If the Court decide in favour of the demurrer of the Crown, the judgment will be the technical one of respondeas ouster, and the traversers will then either plead to bar or demur to the indictment.

THURSDAY.—Although no movement of any interest in the pending trials is expected before Monday, still the subject engrosses so much of the public attention, that the Courts continue to be thronged with spectators.

WILL OF THOMAS DU BUISSON.—This merchant, who lately died suddenly at Newcastle, has by his will, on half a sheet of note-paper, in his own hand writing, disposed of the large sum of £111,000 among his wife and children, in the following manner—viz., to his wife £31,000, to his daughter Elizabeth £20,000, to his daughter Lucy £25,000, and to his son James the whole of his business, and £30,000, recommending him to employ "great care, strict attention, absolute industry, and economy," towards improving it. The probate bears a stamp of £1800.

GREAT FOOT RACE.—A foot-race between Robert Fuller, who has for years borne the title of the champion pedestrian, and George Bradshaw, of Hammersmith, for £50 aside, came off on Monday at Bedfont, in the presence of an assemblage of from three to four thousand persons. The distance contested was 25 miles, and after an arduous struggle the race was won by Bradshaw.

EXTRAORDINARY REVERSE OF FORTUNE.—A few days since a cabman, named Jones (who is called Black Bob), came into possession of nearly £30,000. The property has been in dispute for nearly twenty years. The party, who is the oldest cabman in London, is in his 83d year.

THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF NEMOURS.

The Duchess de Nemours, who is first cousin of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, being the daughter of the Duke Ferdinand of Saxe Coburg Gotha, the brother of the reigning Duke, was married to the Duke de Nemours, the eldest surviving son of the King of the French, in April, 1840.

Saturday, about half-past one, their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Nemours arrived at Woolwich, on a visit to her Majesty. The royal party were received, on landing from the Archimedes, by Gen. Lord Bloomfield, G.C.B., &c., commandant of the garrison, Sir Francis Collier, C.B., captain superintendent of the dock yard, and numerous officers of the garrison. A royal salute was fired, and a guard of honour of the Royal Artillery and Marines was also on duty. Their Royal Highnesses soon afterwards entered one of the Royal carriages, drawn by four horses, and left for town, followed in two other carriages and four by several persons of rank, who had gone to conduct them to town, and the suite of his Royal Highness in a fourth carriage, drawn by two horses.

The Royal party left Paris on Thursday morning by railway for Dunkirk from which place they embarked on board the Archimedes at two o'clock yesterday morning, making the passage to Woolwich within twelve hours. Their Royal Highnesses will remain ten days at Windsor Castle on a visit to the Queen and Prince Albert.

Two of the royal travelling carriages and four, with outriders and attendants, were commanded to be in waiting at the Slough station to convey her Majesty's illustrious guests thence to the Castle; it having been arranged for their Royal Highnesses to proceed from Paddington to that station in the state carriage, and by a special train of the Great Western Railway Company. At a few minutes past four o'clock in the afternoon the royal carriages, from Slough, entered the quadrangle by George the Fourth's gateway, between the York and Lancaster towers, and proceeded to the Queen's entrance. In the first carriage were their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess de Nemours, la Comtesse d'Oraison, dame de la cour to her Royal Highness, and Lord Byron, lord in waiting to her Majesty. In the second carriage were M. le General Colbert and M. le Capitaine de Reille, in attendance upon the Duke de Nemours, and Colonel Wylde, equerry to his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

Upon alighting at the Queen's entrance, their Royal Highnesses were received by Colonel Berkeley Drummond, groom in waiting to her Majesty, Colonel Buckley, equerry in waiting, and the Hon. C. A. Murray, the master of her Majesty's household, by whom they were conducted through the vestibule up the grand staircase, in the centre of which the Duke and Duchess were met by her Majesty (who was attended by the Countess of Mount Edgcumbe, the Hon. Amelia Murray, and the Hon. Harriet Lister) and the Prince Consort. Her Majesty received her royal and illustrious guests in the most warm and affectionate manner, affectionately kissing her royal highness, and proceeding with her, hand-in-hand, to the grand drawing room, accompanied by the Duke de Nemours and the Prince Consort, and followed by the royal attendants.

At the banquet, which was served at eight o'clock in the evening, in the grand dining room, the following royal and distinguished persons were present:—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess de Nemours, their Serene Highnesses the Prince and Princess Hohenlohe Langenbourg, Lady Charlotte Dundas, la Comtesse d'Oraison, the Countess of Mount Edgcumbe, the Hon. Amelia Murray, the Hon. Harriet Lister, Lord Byron, M. le General Colbert, M. le Capitaine de Reille, Colonel Berkeley Drummond Colonel Edward Buckley, Colonel Wylde, Dr. Pretorius, and the Hon. C. A. Murray.

On Monday, their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess de Nemours, and the whole of their suite, left the Castle in two of the royal carriages and four, and proceeded to the Roman Catholic Chapel at Clewer green, where divine service was performed at eleven o'clock, by the Rev. J. F. Wilkinson. Their Royal Highnesses returned to luncheon with the Queen and the Prince.

The Duke and Duchess de Nemours, and suite, left the Castle at half-past nine o'clock on Tuesday, and travelled to town from the Slough station by the Great Western Railway. Their Royal Highnesses arrived at the Paddington terminus at fifteen minutes past ten o'clock. The Duke and Duchess, attended by the Countess d'Oraison, immediately entered one of the Queen's carriages, and proceeded to Buckingham Palace shortly before eleven o'clock. At one o'clock the Duke de Nemours held a levee for the reception of the diplomatic corps at Buckingham Palace. His Excellency the French Ambassador, and the Countess de St. Aulaire, arrived at the Palace shortly before one o'clock. The secretaries and attachés of the embassy, consisting of Comte de Chabot, Count de Noailles, Baron de Talleyrand, and M. Rabaudy, also attended.

In the afternoon, shortly before three o'clock, the Duke and Duchess de Nemours proceeded from Buckingham Palace to Gloucester House, and paid a visit to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester. Their Royal Highnesses afterwards visited his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge.

The Duke of Cambridge visited the Duke and Duchess de Nemours in the afternoon.

We can state upon authority, that their Royal Highnesses will prolong their visit to this country beyond the period originally contemplated. Their Royal Highnesses will remain as guests at Windsor Castle until either the 25th or 27th inst., and then go to Chatsworth, Derbyshire.

Wednesday morning, soon after nine o'clock, their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess de Nemours, accompanied by the Countess d'Oraison and Captain de Reille, honoured the establishment of Messrs. Mortimer and Hunt with a visit.

At 20 minutes past 12 o'clock their Royal Highnesses left town for Windsor Castle. The Duke and Duchess de Nemours and the Countess d'Oraison took their departure from Buckingham Palace in one of the royal carriages for the Paddington terminus of the Great Western Railway. Le General Colbert, le Capitaine de Reille, and the Hon. C. A. Murray followed in another of the Queen's carriages. The illustrious party took their departure for the Slough station.

PORTRAITS OF THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF NEMOURS.

Some of the foreign ministers and a number of the nobility and gentry called yesterday at Buckingham Palace to pay their respects to the Duke and Duchess de Nemours, and entered their names in their Royal Highnesses' visiting book; among them were the Swedish Minister and Countess de Bjornstjerna, Baron Oscar de Bjornstjerna, the Russian Minister, the Danish Minister and Countess Reventlow, the Hanoverian Minister, the Saxon Minister Baron de Thile, Secretary to the Prussian Legation, le General Count Woronzow, Baron Koller, M. [illegible] ft de la Haute Maine; the Duke of Devonshire, the Duke of Sutherland, the Marchioness of Westmeath, Earl and Countess of Ripon, Earl and Countess of Tankerville, Lord Wharncliffe, Lord and Lady Fitzroy Somerset, and Lady Rodd

MEET OF THE ROYAL HUNT.

THE MEET OF THE ROYAL HOUNDS.

The commencement of the season with the Royal Hunt is always an item of some importance in the sporting events of the metropolis.

Country sportsmen are too apt to treat all "Cockney" sporting as a farce—as [illegible] hunters to meet at "cull hunting" and [illegible] stag hunting. But [illegible] must acknowledge that the excitement and science of "the [illegible] has always [illegible] advantage, the nature of the country in the neighbourhood of London is such as almost to preclude the possibility of fox-hounds having a very good run, or at all events renders it a matter of such uncertainty as to make it hardly worth the risk of meeting them.

How often have we loitered away the live-long day by the cover side, with Jolliffe, or the Surrey, or the Old Berkeley, and returned home with a fresh horse, and venting anathemas on fox-hunting near town. And how much oftener have we run round and round in an endless ring, from cover to cover, until our patience, and our horse-flesh, were alike exhausted. No, near London there is no sport equal to stag-hunting, undisturbed as it is by the vicinity of a busy population; and affording, as it does, to the Londoner—a man of few opportunities—a certain run; instead of the prospect of shivering through his "day," in wet leathers, by the side of Banstead Park, or Coombe Wood.

The Royal Hunt is, moreover, a truly royal establishment, well worthy of its name; and, for its fields, there are but few, if any, hunts to equal, none to beat, them. Be it remembered, that the country around town is very closely enclosed, and the pace with staghounds tremendous; and it will be seen, that it takes a good man to be in a good place. Let him who doubts, try!

Hounds, horses, and deer, are all in good condition, and a first-rate season may be confidently looked forward to, by the members of the Royal Hunt.

"A STAGGER."

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, 13th Nov. 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur—Everything in this capital speaks of the approach of winter, and it is easily to be foreseen that furs are likely to play a grand rôle this season in the shape of trimmings for robes, pelisses, manties, pelerines, &c. The Siberian marten, the sable, the blue fox, the Swiss fox, the swansdown, and ermine, are the elegancies chiefly selected, and which nothing else can replace. The way in which these are most usually to be found worn will vary very much; but I will endeavour to guide you by describing one of the most graceful purdesuus which the season has yet called forth. It is a mantle from the atelier of one of our most fashionable artistes, made in blue satin, rounded on each side of the front, and trimmed completely round its whole circumference by a broad band of fur. The hind part is plain at the top, and the front slightly gathered at the epaulette, which is covered by three large silk buttons. A band of fur, similar to that which borders the mantle, is fastened under the third button, and descends to the bottom of the mantle, covering the opening of the arms. Five buttons are placed upon this band; a small fur collar is closed by two broad velvet ribands, and terminated by a fringe. This model may be varied by substituting instead of fur bands velvet ones, in assorted shades, which are equally distinguished and graceful in appearance.

Two or three other things I have seen have much the same character. I shall, however, cite a mantelet in violet velvet, long and rounded behind, and in the form of a shawl in front, and trimmed completely round it by a wide band of marten fur, and also a very graceful ball wrapper in white cashmere, lined with blue plush and bordered with swansdown, having a capucin and sleeves.

The head-dresses that are now worn have nothing very remarkable about them at the present day; some, however, that I have seen, merit a slight notice for the pretty taste displayed in them: for instance, a white satin bat, trimmed under the passe with three rows of satin pleats, the shape being with a pleat of somewhat smaller dimensions, and having the left side ornamented with a bouquet of wild roses. I have also seen the same bat trimmed with two white plumes, and ornamented with little roses in the inside. Another hat, which rather pleased me, was in green African velvet, of a moderate size, trimmed on the right side with two bunches of satin riband of the same colour, and with two similar rouleaux of satin laid upon the front, and serving the purpose of fixing upon the left side a branch of the Indian cress. The whole of these head-dresses were beautifully executed, and gave an air of grace and lightness truly delightful.

The changes in the forms of hats are as yet so perfectly insignificant, that really it would be lost time to describe them, the only real difference being rather in the stuffs composing them, and in the disposition of the ornaments, than in the shape of the hats themselves. Should, however, anything appear so worthy of further notice, you may depend on its not being forgotten by

HENRIETTE DE B.

LITERATURE.

Sir COSMO DIGBY: a Tale of the Monmouthshire Riots. By JAMES AUGUSTUS ST. JOHN, author of "The History of the Manners and Customs of Ancient Greece," &c. Bentley.

In works of fiction, of those founded on fact, which are intended to interest the reader of romances to a greater degree than they might be affected by what they term dry history, too much care cannot be taken by the author in choice of his subject. With the heroes of very remote antiquity, we feel but a very imperfect sympathy—therefore, they seldom succeed in strongly awakening our feelings in their behalf. On the other hand, "too much familiarity breeds contempt," and it proves very hard work for the author to persuade his readers that they are perusing a novel, tale, or romance, the leading features of which they have lately seen in the newspapers. Byron once stated that the life and death of Lord Edward Fitzgerald presented a noble subject for a tragedy, but added, that their story was too near our own time! This fault, or disqualification, which requires the genius of a Scott to contend against, is the outstanding error of the author before us. Besides, he does not interest us in the story or fate of any single one of the rioters (perhaps we may in a slight degree except Redpath)—they are not the personæ of his drama, but are merely introduced towards its denouement as an episodical pageant. Another fault is the title of the work, "Sir Cosmo Digby," who is a repulsive, cold personage—seldom met with throughout the narrative, and then not much influencing the progress of it; for, although the hero of the tale (Denzil), while yet a mere youth, unaccountably becomes his protegé and son-in-law elect on certain conditions, these last are at length performed to his satisfaction more by accident than any obedience to his lectures on the virtues of avarice and misanthropy, which are not overrelished by either the hero or the heroine. Sir Cosmo's only child, Isabella, a young lady, who, to personal beauty, adds the rare accomplishment of (not having an opinion of her own, for every woman has that) reasoning soundly on most matters, and loving rather Platonically than most ladies of romance generally do. Her father, the baronet, lives like Lord Latimer, in "splendid misery," and if the author himself were attached to him, he could not better have shewn his love than by keeping him as long as he has done out of sight.

As to the story of the piece, it is intricate but ingeniously involved, and so naturally enough evolved. Like "Tom Jones," our hero first appears as a mysterious foundling—grows up like Tom for awhile in his country locality (which is the village of Allenfid, in Wales), under the kind care of his murdered father's domestic, one Pierre Ponce, a Frenchman, who is the merryman of the piece, and then with him, as with another Strap, sets out for London, there to seek his fortune, and lives et infernia upon some with that had been entrusted to the care and honesty of those who took him in and nurtured him as a baby.

Amongst the scenes to which he is introduced in town, is a Doctor Winter's madhouse; where he comes in contact, not with a lunatic, but the husband of a patient, who is a wife bereaved of her senses at all times by the sight of her lord. He, nevertheless, loves her so that he cannot forego the pleasure of gazing secretly upon her once a week. This man (Trevor) interests our hero, and subsequently becomes intimate with him; obtaining that kind of power over him which may be deemed fatality. Passing over some by-scenes and characters of no interest or great variety, we will come to the close, when, after the return of Denzil from a short visit to his lady-love, he calls upon his old friend Trevor, and finds him dying. In administering some kindness to the old man, he discovers a miniature which he had constantly worn round the neck, and then the whole truth comes out: Denzil is the illegitimate son of Trevor's wife, whose paramour he shot. Some mutual abhorrence here takes place for awhile; but at last the old man dies, leaving Denzil heir to a large property, after which he obtains the hand of Isabella, and all ends happily.

—But where are the rioters all this time? Where are the accounts of the attack on Newport? We should have known nothing about them, but that Mr. Denzil having gone down to Castle Mawr with the intention of visiting his intended, finds that she is gone on a visit to an aunt's, some miles off; whereupon he and his fidus achates, Pierre Ponce, set out on foot to follow her. On his road, he falls in with the rioters—passes some days and nights in their custody, during which time he gives them some extraordinary and fearful specimens. He is subsequently instrumental in defeating their attack upon the abbey, where the Lady Isabella is on a visit, and the novel hastens speedily to its expected termination.

Our limits preclude us from giving more than a mere esquisse of the design of this tale, which is generally written with a vast deal of poetry and sentiment. There is not much originality of character or situation, but their expression and description are of the highest order, just and beautiful. Humour is not the author's forte—when the scene of Bedlam broke loose (in the third volume), which is extremely puerile, and does not provoke a smile. But, at the same time, there is a great deal of graphic truth in the style; and the manner in which various disputants support their arguments is so very impartial, that it is in vain to seek to know upon which side the author leans himself. The sermon, however, of the field preacher, Ap Hoel, to the Chartists, strongly inclines us to think that no small fervour and zeal could not be counterfeitly put into his mouth. But we will not meddle with the author's politics; we will let him speak for himself in a few quotations from his elegantly written work.

DESCRIPTION OF A WELSH GRAVE YARD.

The spot selected for the grave of Colonel Mudway, was a small level patch of green sward lying on the left hand as you enter the church porch. A yew tree of gigantic dimensions threw forth its funeral branches over it, and so complete was the shelter which their dense foliage afforded, that you might almost there sung and dry durne a hard rain of several hours. On all sides, to a considerable distance, stretched rows of graves and tombstones, extremely varied in age, form, and dimensions. Generally, throughout the Wales, a reverence for the dead is among the most prominent feelings of the people, and this sentiment developes itself in symbolical practices, sometimes of the most touching beauty. Lilies, for example, and other flowers of unrivaled delicate hues, are planted over the graves of virgins, to signify the unsullied purity of the forms beneath; while to express the Christian's hope of immortal and unspeakable existence, the narrow house is overshadowed by ever-verdant laurel or juniper, or the tree of life. At the festival of the resurrection, the hands of filial or paternal love are busy about the mounds of the departed, white-washing or painting the head and foot stones, renewing the embankment of turf, or adding fresh varieties to the rich odoriferous flowers, which distil at night their fragrant dews upon the ashes of the dead. Few scenes, therefore, during spring and summer, are more beautiful than a Welsh churchyard. Shaded by every variety of tree known in the principality, but chiefly by the favourite yew, between rows of which the classical cypress sometimes rears its dusky obelisk, it resembles externally one of the sacred groves of antiquity, while it has within it a beauty unknown to them in those numerous records of faith and hope, which friend has erected over friend, and which religion sanctifies with all its holiest and most powerful influences. In the seclusion of those delicious groves, most persons experience a hushed tranquility of mind indescribably sweet. The ardour of the sun's rays is excluded by a dense canopy of foliage, or tempered by those airs which seem to reside in the covert of woods; though here and there, perhaps, small patterns of sunshine eloquer tie ground, or glow upon the grey and yellow lichens adorning the tombs which have survived the families that once kept them in repair.

The following contains some wholesome truths:—

There is no nation on earth so little vain of their superiority as the English. They have achieved more than any other people; they have carried literature and the sciences to the highest perfection known to the modern world; they have created for themselves the noblest capital city anywhere existing; and yet not only do the majority of persons in this country appear unconscious of the fact; but generally, where it happens to be brought under their notice, endeavour to disparage their own works and turn them into ridicule. The Frenchman is proud of Paris, the Italian of Rome, the Spaniard of Madrid, and even the Turk experiences a glow of exhilaration while pronouncing the name of Stamboul. But few Englishmen consider it in good taste to be pleased with London. It is in their estimation but a huge assemblage of brick and mortar, of shops and warehouses, of police offices and courts of law. This prejudice is more especially observable among certain provincials, who, because condemned to support existence amid the dreary outposts of civilization, endeavour to conceal their envy by libelling the greatest monument of ancient Rome.

The death scene of Redpath is particularly solemn and affecting:

"As he was speaking, all his followers had drawn round him in a semi-circle.

"'Ah! my brave fellows,' he cried, 'you are all there, I see.

"'No, not all,' answered Griffiths; 'some few lie in the streets of Newport. The rest mussed us in the break-up; but they are true. I warrant them, now will fight, look you, on some other day.'

"'Well, let me shake hands with every one of you,' cried he; 'it will be for the last time; and do you tell your comrades, when you return to the hills, that I shook hands with them all by proxy, and that I would have you live like brothers, and conquer when the day comes, or die like men. There is no war, remember, so holy as a war against slavery. Where is Ap Hoel?'

"'Here,' answered the preacher. 'Don't you see me, Redpath?'

"'No,' said he, 'I can scarcely see anything. Give me your hand, Ap Hoel. We have prayed by each other's side and fought together. Pray with me now. I have endeavoured to live like a Christian, and I would do like one; though the world, perhaps, will believe it. But that will not be of little consequence, provided that I have not deceived myself, or that my earnestness and sincerity be taken for virtue.'

Ap Hoel then knelt upon the rock, and all present knelt beside him, while he offered up most fervent and eloquent prayers on behalf of his dying friend. In the midst of his devotions, a quick, convulsive shudder, shook the frame of Redpath. He gazed about him wildly for an instant, then closed his eyes, and his spirit had passed away.

The prayer was cut short, and for some time all present remained silent. Ap Hoel, at length rising from his knees, said, "Let us commit our dear brother to the dust."

Then, immediately, two or three of his followers, who had been armed with mandrils, commenced the digging of the grave: Denzil, Pierre Ponce, the preacher, and Griffiths, with the other Chartists, standing about them in a ring, while they worked. As the men took it, however, by turns, it was not long before the pit was judged to be of sufficient depth. Night, however, had already come on; and at last, by the light of pine-tree branches, which they tore from the trees, and kindled with the lanthers they carried about them, they completed the excavation. They then took the body, and lowered it gently into the grave; and, while Ap Hoel pronounced the words, "Ashes to ashes, dust to dust," began casting in the earth.

The preacher then gave out, verse by verse, a hymn, which all joined in singing; and the requiem of the Charust swelled loud and melancholy on the night breeze, rising as sweetly up to heaven, as if it had proceeded from the mouths of some cathedral choir, and been accompanied by the solemn and exalted instruments. The instruments here put into requisition were of God's workmanship, and the words they uttered burst full from the heart; while tears of real sorrow stood upon the cheeks of many who had been long used to the grave, raised a mound over it, and placed two rude stones, one at the head, the other at the foot. Denzil and his friend watched eagerly the whole of the proceeding

The scene, in all its parts, was singularly impressive. Towards the north rose a precipice, consisting of vast blocks of granite, piled upon each other, to the height of one hundred and fifty feet, and covered, here and there, on their face, by mosses and lichens. A row of tall pine trees bordered the cliff above; and, in front of it, a small platform, the bottom, possibly, of an ancient quarry, bare of trees, though now covered with earth, extended to some distance in the wood. Around, on all sides, upon its margin, arose a circle of vast primeval oaks, which, in summer, when the sun was at the hottest, always secured to the spot a cool, refreshing shade; yet the grass which covered it was soft and fine, though now partly concealed by the withered leaves. Right by the mound of the dead one, a congregate, leaping to and fro, and bounding with their young ones; and here, also, according to the habit of the country, the gobuns and fairies celebrate their midnight revels. Many forest steeds range away on all sides; as that a spring, which gushes forth in front of it, has time to gather, before it issues from the wood, the aid of so many small tributaries, that it is become a rivulet, by following the course of which, therefore, the curious traveller would find himself directed to the Chartist's grave.

During the summers which have elapsed since the events we have recorded, the grassy mound which covers the remains of Redpath, has been constantly strewed with flowers, though by whose hands no one can tell. A small pathway, however, has been worn to the spot; and it is possible that, at some future day, a durable monument may mark the narrow house of Oliver Redpath.

With these extracts we conclude our notice of what, with its few faults, is a most interesting tale.

MUSIC.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

Handel's oratorio of "Deborah" was chosen for the commencement of the winter series of this society's splendid concerts on Wednesday evening at Exeter-hall, which was crowded on the occasion with the élite of all professional and amateur musicals in the metropolis, with a plentiful sprinkling of well-known provincials too. The performance was a truly splendid one; interesting, in the first place, as the revival of Handel's favourite oratorio, which, for the first time for many years, was given as a whole, and in the next, indicating, by the manner of its production and reception, the giant strides that genuine musical taste is making in this country, maugre the illiberal and ignorant assertions of our flimsy neighbours the Parisian critics (?) The tone which pervades this beautiful work is that of the highest devotional grandeur. No man ever so well understood the architecture of music (if we may be allowed the phrase) as Handel. In his structures there is no levity, no extraneous ornament—all is solemn and sedate, suiting the awful grandeur of man's "communion with the skies." By nature the Milton of music, no doubt he often read and mused upon the following lines of that immortal:—

Let my due feet never fail
To walk the studious cloister's pale,
And love the high embowed roof
With antique pillars massy proof,
And storied windows richly dight
Casting a dim religious light;
There let the pealing organ blow,
To the full-voiced choir below,
In service high, and anthems clear,
As may with sweetness through mine ear
Dissolve me into ecstacies,
And bring all Heaven before mine eyes.

As in his "Samson," his finely poetical idea was to contrast the great Jehovah with the idol Dagon (witness the chorus of "Fixed in his everlasting seat"), so in this oratorio, a similar beauty is effected by opposing the true worship of the Israelites to the idolatry of Baal. Although several beautiful extracts from this inspired work have been heard frequently, such as "How lovely is the blooming fair," and "Tears such as tender fathers shed," yet they derived new beauty from being heard in their appropriate places, and were most exquisitely sung by Miss Dolby and Mr. Phillips. Miss Rainforth, as Deborah, sang with good taste, but with a little indecision of voice: and Miss Cubitt sang "Now sweetly smiling peace," most admirably, and was deservedly encored. Guibilei was effective with his round manly style in Sisera, but the Barak of Miss Dolby is beyond all praise. This young lady has raised herself, by this performance, a hundred fold in our previous high esteem, and Phillips was never happier than in the part of the father Abinoam. The choruses, as usual, were most splendidly trained, and produced even some awfully grand effects. The band, led by Mr. Perry, would have satisfied the fastidious composer himself, and the ensemble was one of the greatest musical treats we ever experienced. We shall give a further notice, with more detail, of this wonderful and beautiful production on its repetition.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

LINES TO A WEEPING WILLOW!

Love sometimes leads astray to misery.—SHELLEY'S "Julian and Maddalo."

Oh! willow tree! sad willow tree!
Weeping o'er that dark cold water,—
Tell me what thy grief may be:—
Is it for the hapless daughter,
Of our hamlet's home, that fled
To dwell amongst the silent dead,
Before Time's withering hand had sought her?

Oh! willow tree! sad willow tree!
Are thy green dishevelled tresses
All the mourners that there be?
Is there no fond hand that dresses,
In the churchyard's nook, with flow'rs
Her nameless grave, at evening hours,
And still, tho' lost, her mem'ry blesses?

Yes, willow tree! sad willow tree!
Thou'rt companioned in thy mourning,—
Yonder pallid visions see!
From his sorrow's task returning!
'Tis the wasted form of him
Who often saw her eyes, now dim
In death, with joy and beauty burning!

Oh! willow tree! sad willow tree!
What could cheer their weary beaming?
Words of groundless jealousy,
From him, on whom her heart was dreaming,
Made her seek a sinful grave
In the cold bosom of the wave,—
What bitter fruit of Love's beteeming!

Oh! willow tree! sad willow tree!
She was Truth's and Virtue's daughter,—
Though disgrac'd in death she be,
There never lay beneath the water,
A purer pearl than was the mind
Within her lovely form enshrin'd,
Not Death, but angels should have caught her.

And willow tree!—kind willow tree!
Borne her on their wings to heaven,
Before she fell from purity
Or had a sin to be forgiven!
She were then in Paradise
As bright a seraph of the skies
As e'er of old from thence was driven!

NATIONAL SPORTS.

"Ah, Fan, poor bitch! you little think what sort of shooting your master's about just now."—THE RIVALS.

Excitement is the order of the day, from the quid nunces of Westminster Hall to the quod nunces of Tattersall's. You hear of nothing but the two recent cases of Tartar catching, viz, the capture of Dan O'Connell and Lord George Bentinck. Leaving the editor to assume his wig of wisdom to deal with the former, we don the cap and bells and turn to the latter. In our last number the fact was stated, that a set of gentlemen with their dander up had set upon certain cavaliers of the sporting world, because of their treatment, and that the lex talionis was in full grind. We come now to report progress: to this intent we must be retrospective. When the legs began to the kickers they were ungrateful enough not to appreciate the condescension and to wince under the process. Having recourse to discretion, they employed agents to report the business done in the subscription-room at Doncaster, and those by whom the bargains were transacted. In short, as my lord was booking a bet with Gully or Crockford, a spy from Pancery-lane was booking it with his notes and comments. Thus provided, he gave in a list of such right honourable and honourable betters as he caught in flagrante, and forthwith they were dealt with according to Lu. Foremost of these was the owner of Coldstream, and, as the rumour runs, Mr. Bowes has to stand the first blow. As it requires an intimacy with logarithms, to put before the reader any idea of the amount sought to be recovered by the actions already commenced, we are not competent to the task; but we are bound to announce that if, as it is contended, the parish in which the money lost be entitled to a third of the penalties, henceforth every pauper in Doncaster may reckon upon his three courses and dessert for the remainder of his natural life. It has been intimated, for instance, to Mr. Hill (Harry Hill as they familiarly denominate him) that his instalment shall be one hundred thousand pounds or thereabouts, and if he have a spice of the spirit of Augustus Tomlinson in his composition, he will consider himself highly honoured. But lest it be supposed, because the vein in which the history is told partakes somewhat of levity, that the matter is of a similar quality, we beg to assure the reader it is far from a joke. The opinion of the most eminent advocate in London has been taken as to the possibility of the actions being successfully defended; and he has stated that it is out of the question. Our belief is, that where clear proof can be shown of the winnings—as, for example, of the parties who made the payment—the law, in its present state, makes the penalty inevitable. This, while, on the present occasion, it will, most probably, defeat the recovery of the enormous sums sued for, will annihilate the trade of betting on the turf. The hapless be is deceived by gods and men. When the Jockey Club declared off, as a tribunal for the settlement of claims of honour, the mighty deserted him; and, when he took to the lawyers (as matter of courtesy, we suppose, they are to be classed with such), he perpetrated a moral (or, rather an immoral) suicide. But, is he the only victim? By the mass, no! The mob of gentlemen who live at ease—with more money than wit—your great amateur speculators, who caused your little professional theorists to be kicked because they had less money than wit, what comes of them? Like Bob Acres' bitch, they little thought what sort of shooting was on the tapis. Thus stands this very pretty quarrel—and as well to show that betting is still in esse as to wind up our weekly account according to custom, we subjoin the current average of the odds done at Tattersall's

6 to 1 aust Scotsa lot ; 18 to 1 Forth a lot; 8 to 1 Rattan; 8 to 1 Buck; 20 to 1 Lonsistone; 20 to 1 Orlando; 20 to 1 Launcelot; 50 to 1 Foch a Ballnch ; 50 to 1 Compuevo; 50 to 1 Marinella colt; 66 to 1 Vat colt: 2000 to 1 King of the Gipsies ; 1000 to 10 Lorimer

HER MAJESTY'S STAG HOUNDS.—On Monday the meet was at Iver Heath, and the turn out took place between the Heath and Farnham-common. That splendid deer, Snowdrop, was uncarted on this occasion, and went away at his usual pace over Iver Heath, Iver Moor, Cross Common, taking the left of Cranford St. Peter's, and right away to Poland's Woods, where the hounds threw up a fox, which caused a check for about a quarter of an hour. Up to this time the speed had been tremendous for about nine miles over a stiffish country, when the hounds were got together and laid on the right scent, the field had become very select. They again went away at a slapping pace over a fine country to Langley, near Kreasmere Pond worth, and the deer was taken at a farm close by. This has been a most splendid run; at least upwards of two hours and a half, and although there were more than two hundred at the turn-out, there were scarcely twenty at the take, including the noble master of the hunt, Captain Heathcote, Captain Oliver, of the Blues; Captain Bulkeley, and other officers of the Life and Foot Guards; Mr Chater, Mr Worley, of Farnham, Mr. Cox, of Uxbridge, &c.

THE MARQUIS OF WATERFORD.—The noble marquis has addressed the following letter to the members of the Tipperary Hunt:—"Curraghmore, Nov. 8.—Gentlemen,—I have delayed writing to you until some final arrangement as to hunting your county has been made. Mr. Millett has undertaken that office, and I now beg to thank you for the kind attention and support you have shown me during the period I resided amongst you. I think it right to warn you that whatever interest I may feel in every sport that is followed in Tipperary, my hounds were poisoned; I treated the matter with contempt. In January last they were again poisoned; I discovered the offender, and forgave him; but I stated publicly, if a similar outrage was again committed, I should give up hunting the county. In 1843, my stables were burnt; and, but for the prompt conduct of my servants, the whole establishment would have been consumed. From the threatening notices I had received, and from the sworn evidence of persons on the spot when the fire commenced, the magistrates came to the conclusion that the burning was malicious. I immediately determined to leave Tipperary, feeling that such a system of annoyance more than counterbalanced the pleasures of hunting, for which alone I proposed to reside at Lakefield.—I have the honour to be your obedient servant, WATERFORD."

YORKSHIRE CHESS ASSOCIATION.

On Wednesday, the 8th inst., the annual meeting of this Association was held at the George Hotel, in Huddersfield. The meeting commenced at ten o'clock, and the attendance of the players was so great as to occupy three of the rooms in the second story of the hotel. The following players honoured the present annual meeting:

The Right Hon. the Earl of Mexborough, who, on this occasion, had done the association the honour of presiding; Mr. Pierce, from Sheffield; Messrs. Hollinsworth, from Leeds; Newham, Newberry, Dodson, and Smith, from Nottingham; Mr. Maw, from Crowle, in Lincolnshire; Rev. W. Blew, Goodmanham; Messrs. Rhodes, Bateman, Brown, Lowe, and Richardson, from Leeds; Mr. Akins, Ringley; Rev. R. Garvey, and Messrs. W. Robinson, E. Shepherd, A. Shepherd, Walker, and Wilson, from Wakefield; Messrs. F. W. Cronhelm, E. Cronhelm, Forbes, Bromley, Hervey, Allen, and Boyd, from the Hall-ha'-bank; Mr. Marsden, treasurer of the Huddersfield Chess Club; Mr. Parratt, secretary (to whose vigorous exertions much of the éclat of the anniversary was owing); and J. C. Fenton, Esq., the Rev. J. R. Oldham, Captain Hudson, and Messrs. Brearley, Mann, Kilner, Dewhirst, J. Brook, Barker, J. Clay, W. H. Kaye, C. S. Floyd, W. Stables, Pritchett, Freeman, Eddison, C. Atkinson, J. Swift, Welsh, Boscovitz, Clough, Horn, Starkey, T. T. Crosland, T. Battye, Geo. Rimmer, and J. Armitage.

At one a lunch was provided, at which the combatants in the minute tournament refreshed themselves for further fights; and playing was then resumed, and maintained until dark. The more eager players, however, maintained their play by candlelight, until dinner was actually upon the table.

At five o'clock the company sat down to a dinner which combined every delicacy of the season. The Earl of Mexborough occupied the chair, supported on the right by the Rev. J. R. Oldham and on the left by the Rev. R. Garvey. Mr. Francis occupied the vice chair. The cloth having been drawn, and a dessert placed on the table, the noble Chairman proposed "The Queen;" observing that, as chess players, they all knew that without a queen they could do nothing. Given with three times three, and one chess more The Chairman next gave "The Queen Dowager." She had long played a good game, he said, and he trusted it would be many years ere she was check-mated. The third toast was "The Queen, Albert, Albert Prince of Wales, and the rest of the Royal Family."

Mr Francis then rose, and in a speech of considerable point, observed — [illegible] could not be a higher compliment paid to the game of chess than that it should be proved able to draw together such a multitude of persons of such various tastes and habits, and feelings: amongst the fifty gentlemen there assembled there was as great variety of occupations and professions as could be met with even at any political assembly. This surely proved that there was something not to be found in an everyday recreation. Formerly, he had been a considerable number of chess clubs in England, and they had of late increased almost as rapidly as works on chess, which he should say had been published during the last five years. But there was one thing still wanting, viz., a rallying point at which all chess clubs might meet, and where all amateurs in and from together in the practice of their favourite amusement. In this respect the Yorkshire Association had set a most noble, and he trusted it would also prove a useful example (applause); and called, he thought, for their warmest thanks, and was the cause and excuse (if excuse were needed) for the toast he had to propose, which was "Prosperity to the Yorkshire Chess Association" (Applause.) Mr. Francis concluded by relating a circumstance which he had just heard in reference to the Palamede, which showed that there was a subject of daily moment of importance. It was well known that scientific journals were not called upon to contribute to the national resources; or, in words better understood by John Bull, they were not taxed. He had just discovered, however, had noticed that he would in future be called upon to pay a journal, because it was not a scientific journal. He did not wish to decry M. Jaun, who had certainly been particularly civil to him. He must, however, find another journal, because it was not a scientific journal. He did not wish to decry M. St Amant

MELTON MOWBRAY.

HUNTING.

To the field—to the field—
'Tis the huntsman's good horn,
Sea—how the glad hounds at his summons obey:—
The dew-drop of morn
Hath scarce left the thorn,
But they are all up for away, and away!

To the field—to the field—
'Tis the beagle's wild note
That sings its deep music thro' forest and glen:—
What echo can float
From Melody's throat
Like that of "View-holla" again and again!

To the field—to the field—
Now the chace is begun,
Follow on—follow on—what a beautiful sight!
Latona's swift son
Seems with us to run,
And cheats sister DI of her light, of her light!

From the field—from the field—
Now the moon, she is up—
From horse to the board let us weary repair;
We'll merrily sup
And in wassail cup
We'll drink nine times nine "To the Fair—TO THE FAIR!"

November was held by the ancients to be under the tutelary protection of Diana, and this might possibly be on account of the prevalence of hunting and field sports in general during this month. In the calm, dark days, which now often occur, this notion has often suggested itself to us when we have heard the cheerful and lively music of several packs of harriers and of beagles at one time, in full cry, in different directions, when we might well say with Shakspeare:—

My hounds shall make the welkin answer them,
And fetch shrill echoes from the hollow earth.

Of Melton-Mowbray—"the renowned metropolis of the fox-hunting world"—we annex a spirited view, the best accompaniment for which will be Nimrod's characteristic description from the beautiful reprint from the Quarterly Review, entitled "The Chace, the Turf, and the Road."

Melton-Mowbray generally contains from two to three hundred hunters, in the hands of the most experienced grooms England can produce the average number being ten to each sportsman residing there, although some of those who ride heavy, and rejoice in long purses, have from fourteen to twenty for their own use: the stud of the Earl of Plymouth for many years exceeded the last mentioned number. It may seem strange that one man should, under any circumstances, need so large a number of horses solely for his personal use in the field; and it must be admitted that few countries do require it. In Leicestershire, however, the universal practice is for each sportsman to have at least two hunters in the field on the same day—a practice found to be economical, as it is from exhaustion, the effect of long-continued severe work, that the health of horses is most injured. And when it is also borne in mind that hounds are to be reached from Melton, Leicester, &c., every day in the week—that one horse out of six in every man's stud is, upon an average, lame, or otherwise unfit for work—and that a horse should always have five days' rest after a moderate, and at least seven or eight after a severe, run with hounds—it will not seem surprising that ten or twelve hunters should be deemed an indispensable stud for a regular Leicestershire sportsman.

The stables and other conveniences of hunters in the town and neighbourhood are upon a very superior scale, and the greater part of the studs remain there all the year round; though, from the comparatively small quantity of arable land in the county of Leicester, and the very great demand for forage, oats, and hay, are always considerably dearer here than at any other place in England. The sum-total of expenses attending a stud of twelve hunters at Melton, including every out-going, is, as nearly as can be estimated, £1000 per annum. In all stables the average outlay for the purchase of horses is great—at least two hundred guineas each hunter; and, in some, the annual amount of wear and tear of horse-flesh is considerable.

At no distant date—within, at most, thirty years—Melton-Mowbray was an insignificant-looking little town. It is prettily situated in a rich vale, through which the river Stoure passes, but had nothing an artist would have called a feature about it, except its beautiful church. But of late it has put on a very different appearance, owing to the numbers of comfortable houses which have been erected for the accommodation of its sporting visitors, who now spend not less, on an average, than £50,000 per annum on the spot. It stands on one of the great north roads, eighteen miles from Nottingham, and fifteen from Leicester; which latter place is also become a favourite resort of sportsmen, as it is well situated for the best part of the Quorn, and Lord Lonsdale's countries, and many of the favourite covers of the Atherstone (lately better known as Lord Anson's) country, can be reached from it.

The town of Melton furnishes an interesting scene on each hunting morning. At rather an early hour are to be seen groups of hunters, the finest in the world, setting out in different directions to meet different packs of hounds. Each sportsman sends forward two. On one is mounted a very light but extremely well-dressed lad, who returns home on his master's cover hack, or in the dickey of his carriage, if he has happened to be carried to cover in the more luxurious fashion. On the other hunter is a personage of a very different description. This is what is called the "second-horse man;" he rides the second horse, which is to carry his master with the hounds after his having had one, or part of one, chace on the first. This description of servant is by no means easy to procure; and he generally exhibits in his countenance and demeanour something like a modest assurance that he possesses qualities of importance. In short, he must have some brains in his head: be a good horseman, with a light hand; be able to ride very well to hounds: and, above all, he must have a good eye to, and a thorough knowledge of, a country, to enable him to give his master a chance of changing his horse in a run, and not merely when it is over. Lord Sefton brought this second-horse system into fashion at the time he hunted Leicestershire, when Jack Raven, a light weight, and son of his huntsman, the celebrated John Raven, huntsman to the still more celebrated Mr. Meynell, used to ride one of his thousand-guinea hunters in his wake—if we may so express ourselves—in the field, to which he changed his seat at the first convenient opportunity. The system, however, has been improved upon since then. The second-horse man now rides to points, instead of following the hounds, and thus often meets his master at a most favourable moment, when his good steed is sinking, with one that has not been out of a trot. There is much humanity as well as comfort in this arrangement; for at the pace hounds now go over grass countries, horses become somewhat distressed under heavy weights in a short time after the chace begins, when the scent lies well, and they are manfully ridden up to the pack.

About an hour and a half after the servants are gone forward with the hunters, a change of scene is to be observed at Melton. Carriages and four appear at some doors; at others very clever, and, most commonly, thoroughbred horses are gently in hand, ready for their owners to mount. The by-roads of this country being bad for wheels, the hack is often the better conveyance of the two—always indeed, unless the fixture be at a place on, or not far from, a turnpike-road; and twelve or fourteen miles are generally performed by him within the hour.

The style of your Meltonian fox-hunter has long distinguished him above his brethren of what he calls the provincial class. When turned out of the hands of his valet, he presents the very beau-ideal of his caste. The exact Stultz-like fit of his coat, his superlatively well-cleaned leather breeches and boots, and the generally apparent high breeding of the man, can seldom be matched elsewhere: and the most cautious sceptic on such points would satisfy himself of this fact at one single inspection.

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE SETTLEMENT.

LONG before the honey-moon had passed, the ci devant Lady Grange—now Mrs. Vincent Darnley—had reason to know that she had made a mistake. Darnley was not the man she had imagined him to be: he was not, in fact, like that man; and when she had ascertained how Sir Arthur's property had been left, she perceived most distinctly that she had been overreached

Nor was Darnley exactly satisfied with the bargain he had made. It had certainly answered his immediate purpose; but instead of her being exceedingly rich, as he had supposed, he found her—considering the style in which she had lived—extremely poor. He therefore felt he had been overreached too! and this mutual feeling did not at all tend to promote mutual confidence and love.

During the first week—which seemed to Darnley six days too long—they were absent from home; but in the course of the second he was three times arrested, and two dirty persons were placed in the house to take care of the elegant "furniture and effects."

These extraordinary proceedings—being perfectly novel to Mrs. Darnley—somewhat alarmed her: still she did not then deem it expedient to break loose. nor indeed when the third individual was left in possession—albeit he was even a more disreputable-looking person than either of the others—did she, apparently, lose her amiable temper; but when she found her fond and affectionate husband selling out with unexampled freedom—purchasing pianofortes, thorough-bred horses, dogs, all sorts of things! and having every day home to dinner a parcel of men of whom she knew nothing, and of whose conversation she didn't approve—she began to think it high time to look to herself; and more especially as everything she had possessed was then under his absolute control.

"My dear," she observed, with appropriate calmness, Darnley having had the previous night the most "roaring" party of the first series, "I would suggest—it is, of course, an extremely delicate point for me to mention; still, I am sure that you will neither feel offended nor ascribe it to any incorrect motive—but I would, dear, suggest, or rather remind you that the settlement—that is, my settlement—has not been yet completed."

"I have not forgotten it, my dear," replied Darnley, who had promised to settle all upon her immediately after their marriage; his plea being, of course, that there was not sufficient time to do it before, "I never do forget those things."

"Had it not better be done at once, my dear?"

"There's no necessity for any great haste, I suppose?"

"No, dear: still I should like to have it done. It would be more—you understand my motive;"

"Oh, perfectly! Well, we'll see about it."

"Do, there's a dear. And if it makes no difference, my attorney, Mr. Blincall, whom I have always found to be a highly honourable man—"

"It can make no difference, they are all highly honourable men. But don't annoy me now: any time will do for that."

Well! as any time would do, and as Mrs. Darnley felt that the present time would be the most agreeable, she sent for Mr. Blincall, whom she had known for some years, and who, in conformity with the desire expressed in her note to him, called without delay.

"Mr. Blincall, dear, my attorney," she observed, when the servant had brought up that gentleman's card, "Shall I desire William to show him up, my dear?

"Show him up! what for?"

"He has called about the settlement," she replied, in a whisper.

"Who sent for him?"

"Why, my dear, I sent for him."

"Tell that person," said Darnley, addressing the servant, "to call when I send for him."

"William, leave the room," said Mrs. Darnley, "I'll speak to that gentleman myself my dear," she added, with a look of amazement, when the servant had returd, "what on earth am I to understand by this?"

"You are to understand, Mrs. Darnley, that I am master here."

"I am quite aware of that, and wish you to be so. I sent for Mr. Blincall, merely because you said that my time would do!"

"And by sending for him in such desperate haste you have shown a want of confidence which to me is most offensive."

"Indeed, there is no want of confidence on my part: in sending for him, I had no such feeling. Of course, I am sorry that I have been so unfortunate as to offend you, but now that it is in the house, my dear, I think it may as well be done at once."

"It shall be done when I please to have it done, and not before."

"But, surely you mean—"

"I mean, madam, to act as I please. I'll submit to no dictation."

"I am sure that I have no wish to dictate to you; but, of course, you intend to have it done?"

"Your conduct has rendered that a matter of doubt."

"A matter of doubt!—Mr. Darnley!—Why what can you mean?"

"I mean that your conduct is highly reprehensible; and, that since you have shown this gross want of confidence in my honour, madam, I'll make no settlement at all."

"You will not?"

"Come, come: be calm. I'll have none of your storming. You will remember that you are in my house, madam, not your own."

"And do you imagine that I will submit to be thus treated?"

"Will, you make less noise?"

"No sir, I will not! But I perceive it all clearly now; I must see what can be done in this matter; some other course, sir, must be pursued."

"I know what course I shall pursue, and that soon, if you do not behave yourself, madam, with more propriety."

"Is it—can it be possible?—"

"You had better be silent."

"Am I not then to be permitted even to speak?"

"You will show more wisdom by holding your tongue."

"Oh! I'll very soon see about this."

"Where are you going?"

"Sir, I'm going to consult my attorney on the subject."

"Have you already forgotten that I am master here? or did you not understand the message I sent down to that person by the servant? Madam," he added, ringing the bell, "I will here be obeyed."

"Obeyed!" she echoed, with a contemptuous curl of the lip.

"Be seated, madam."

"I will not be seated!"

"Do you hear me?" rejoined Darnley, as he led her to the sofa with a resolute grasp, still, however, maintaining the most perfect calmness, "submission is a virtue, madam when I shall require you to cultivate with care."

Do you take me for a child?"

"You are much too old, madam, for that to be possible."

"You are a brute!" she exclaimed, bursting into tears as he bowed in the semblitude o an acknowledgement of the compliment.

"William," said he, as the servant entered, "did you deliver my message to that person?"

"No, sir."

"Why did you not?"

"Mistress, sir—"

"Silence! Deliver it now, and show him out."

"Am I then," cried Mrs. Darnley, sobbing, "to consult no one?"

"Have you not a husband to consult? Whom should a woman consult in preference to her husband."

"A sweet husband I have got I find."

"I am happy to hear you say so. Wives should appreciate the virtues of their husbands they should regard them as their oracles—their household gods; they should be submissive to them, obedient in all things, gentle, amiable, tranquil. I am therefore glad to find that I stand so high in your estimation, and as a reward for the expression of your exemplary sentiment, I will allow you, my dear, to consult whom you please. If the person who has just left the house be your favourite adviser, you are at liberty, my love, to go to him."

"I will go, sir!"

"You may if you please, my dear, go to the devil, and the sooner you do go the better shall like it. You may now leave the room."

Fearing with impatience to know the worst, Mrs. Darnley took immediate advantage of this permission to depart, and, having hastily dressed herself, repaired to the office of Mr Blincall, with the view of explaining to him the peculiar position in which she stood, and of so having his very best advice.

"Oh! Mr. Blincall," she exclaimed, as she sank into a chair, in a state of exhaustion, apparently the most perfect.

"What is the matter?" inquired Mr. Blincall.

"Oh! that horrid husband of mine!"

"What has happened?"

"Oh! the wretch! Would you believe it?" she added, suddenly recovering. "You heard of my unfortunate marriage. Oh! that I had died, Mr. Blincall! Well, we married in haste, unhappily, to please him—in haste—and the odious brute promised, as there was no time before, to settle everything upon me immediately after our marriage."

Mr. Blincall, being an extremely sagacious person, shook his head with great significance

"Ah! I perceive," resumed Mrs. Darnley, "I perceive clearly that you guess what is coming"

"He now, I presume, refuses to perform that promise."

"Mr. Bincell, he does refuse. He refuses to make any settlement at all. Now, my dear Mr. Bincell—"

"I am sorry to say, nothing"

"Can you not compel him, absolutely and legally, to perform his promise?"

"Yes, sir, I to be robbed, plundered! Is all my property to, to, to be dissipated—squan dered away all to go to ruin? Oh! I shall go mad! Have I no control over it by law?"

"None whatever."

"What is the use—as of law, if it will not meet a case like this? Oh! Mr. Bincell, you see before you now a wretched, deluded, cruelly ill-used woman. Is there nothing you can advise me to do?"

"Not professionally, my dear madam, but, as a friend, I would offer some advice."

"Tell me, pray tell me how I am to act."

"In the first place, then, I should advise you to be calm—perfectly calm."

"Calm! When I see the horrid prospect of squandering my property away, how, how can I be calm?"

"I say, certainly, what I should advise, as a matter of prudence, under the circumstances—seeing that you are now, of course, entirely in his power; and calmness, it is evident, will have far more effect than impetuosity."

"But, ought not a wrench like that to be held up to public execration?"

"I would submit, my dear madam, that this is nothing to our present purpose. Menaces, in cases of this description, are worse than useless. Your object is, of course, to induce him to perform his promise, and, in pursuance of that object, I have advised you to be calm. I now further advise you to commission some mutual friend to speak to him on the subject, to appeal to his honour and sense of justice, and thus prevail upon him mildly to do that which he must of necessity feel to be right."

"Alas! I know of no mutual friend whom I can trust."

"There is your brother, Mr. Greville—why not get him to speak to Mr. Darnley? He knows him, I presume?"

"Yes, he knows him. He has dined with him frequently, at Sir Arthur Cleveland's. But my brother, unfortunately, is not a man of business."

"So much the better!" Mr. Darnley is not a man of business. They will, therefore, do very well together; and a brother is certainly the most proper person to take a matter of this kind in hand. Let Mr. Greville go to him in a friendly manner—let him but appeal to his feelings calmly, and, depend upon it, all will yet be well."

"Never, Mr. Bincell, never! I fear Ret is it not cruel?"

"Do not think of that now. Consult your feelings. Appear to have confidence in him still."

"If ever I should get a settlement, I'll not live with the wretch another hour."

"I need not say that it will be as well for you not to tell him that."

"Oh, the vile creature! Did you ever, in the whole course of your life, hear of any one half so base? You can perceive what he is by the insolent message he sent down to you. I am very, very sorry, that such a message was delivered."

"You are not of the smallest importance. I beg that you will not suffer that to annoy you. But take my advice: be calm, speak to your brother on the subject; let him go to Mr. Darnley, and, I have not the slightest doubt of being prevailed upon so do you, per—"

With many eloquent expressions of thankfulness, mingled with a variety of indignant exclamations, having reference to the wrongs, Mrs. Darnley then left Mr. Bincell, and proceeded to the residence of her brother.

Greville had not seen her since her marriage with Darnley. The "happy couple" had sent their cards, with silver bonds enclosed, to all their friends; to them, daily serving, but Greville she had taken no notice. She knew him, however, so well, that this fact d not for a moment deter her from visiting his side—or rather commanding his services—for did she feel in the slightest degree apprehensive of being reproved for neglect: she went to the house boldly and at once; and having learned that he was then in the library alone, to the library she proceeded forthwith

"Ah! Gertrude," cried Greville, as she entered, "you are a stranger."

"I am, Alexander, somewhat of a stranger to you."

"What's the matter? You are not in good spirits."

"I am not, indeed. Alexander, you must come to-morrow morning, and speak to that horrid wretch who has ruined me for ever."

"Do you allude to your new husband?"

"Husband! Alexander—do not call him an husband; he's no husband; he's unworthy of the name."

"But you allude to him, of course?"

"I do."

"Well, what am I to speak to him about?"

"Before we married he promised to make a settlement, and now I find he's not about that promise—"

"Well if he'll not, why there's an end of the matter."

"But I want you to go to him—to explain to him the cruelty of his conduct, and to insist upon his doing me justice."

"Of what use will that be? What influence can I possibly have over him? You speak precisely as if I had the power to control his actions."

"You have at least the power to do what I wish you to do."

"I may have, certainly. It's impossible to tell, seeing that these things are hidden, still, I may have; and if I have, of course I shall exercise that power. Turn I'm to understand he does'nt treat you kindly?"

"Kindly! He is a brute, Alexander—a perfect brute! Things are going to ruin as fast as they can go. My property is being nearly dissipated. He is living in the most extravagant style. He is spending an enormous deal of money. Nothing is too expensive for him. Day after day he has a set of people home, who waste there drinking and singing and shouting, and making all sorts of horrid noises about the house, until three, four, five, six, seven, in the morning. Really it is monstrous."

"Well, there's no accounting for these things."

"Oh! that ever I should have married such a man!—that ever I should have been such a fool!"

"Do you remember, Gertrude, who it is that says, 'Marriages are made in heaven?'"

"Alexander! I beg of you not to be absurd."

"Absurd?"

"Aye, sir, absurd! I will not be mocked. I have to suffer quite enough as it is."

"I alluded to this admirable system of Providence in the hope of proving that upon one grand point you are a group. You say that you were a fool to marry such a man, and blame yourself therefore? Why should you blame yourself for that which you could not by any possibility have prevented? You are not to be blamed."

"I certainly do begin to believe, Alexander, that there is a fate in these matters—"

"To be sure, there is! I never had any doubt at all about it. Things must take their course."

"Well, I dare not stop any longer now. You will come to-morrow morning: you'll be certain to come!—not early, if you do we'll not be up: too late, for he'll be out. About one or half past. You know what I wish you to do. Good by for the present." Such a pass was beyond all conception absurd. Besides, in her view, the two cases were not analogous: fortunately not!—her conduct's be—for while she felt, and strongly too, that she could not with any show of justice be punished, she was ready to contend that no punishment could by any possibility be too severe for him.

Royal Horse Artillery at Portobello, Limerick, &c., A and C troops; Royal Foot Artillery, 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 7th, 8th, and 9th battalions, Dublin, Athlone, &c., 2,600; Royal Sappers and Miners, 600, Royal Engineers, 200.

GRAND TOTAL.

Cavalry, 2,800; Infantry, 13,600; Depots, 4,200; Royal Horse and Foot Artillery, 2,600 Royal Sappers and Miners, 600; Royal Engineers, 200 men—total, 23,800 effective troops

The 2nd Foot, stationed at Manchester, 64th, at Weedon, 87th, at Manchester, 70th, at Leeds, and Staff Regiment, at Northampton, are ordered to be prepared at a moment's notice by railway to Liverpool, and thence to embark for Ireland, in case their services may be required. A battalion of each of the regiments of Foot Guards in London is also in marching order.

DEVONPORT, Nov. 12.—The Stromboli, 6, steam-frigate, Commander the Hon. E. Plunkett, having her defects repaired, sailed hence on Friday for Cork. The Nesbit, tender, arrived from Portsmouth, and, taking from the Swale lighter the remaining detachment of troops for Pendennis Castle, sailed again yesterday. The Acorn, steam-ship, Commander Sackling, is in the Sound waiting orders. It is said she will proceed to Cork, to embark the whole regiment for the Cape.

The following is an extract of a letter, dated her Majesty's ship Fishguard, Rio de Janeiro, Sept. 11, 1843:—"The Frolic arrived here last night with a slaver she had captured off Cape Frio, having on board 360 slaves, men, women, and children. The slaver was only about double the size of one of our launches, and the poor unfortunate beings were packed in her like as many sausage would be in a case. It appears that they had been stowed in the hut for the space of 60 days."

HARVEST MOON.—How soft and serene is the harvest moon!—how calm, how beautiful, how bright! When all around is tranquil and clear, and the nightingale sings in her sweetest strain, how touching the tones of endearment sound!—who would not hist?—who could not love? Then Night discards her sombre veil, and—mountnow her white one studded with brilliants—celebrates that lovely morn when she became the bride of Day.—Sylvester Sound, the Somnambulist.

SIR CLEMENT DANES CLOCK.—The obstinacy of the parochial authorities, in neglecting to adjust the dials of this public clock, is very remarkable; probably they have too great a weight of public business on their hands

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE, FRIDAY.—Since Monday a very moderate supply of English wheat has been received for the market, which, to-day, was scarcely filled with samples Fine parcels sold at full previous rates; but, in other qualities, exceedingly little was done In fine foreign wheat, not much business was doing, and prices remained without variation. Coffee.—Considerable speculation has been going on in Ceylon coffee, the value of which, during the last six weeks, has risen nearly 20s per cwt. All other kinds of coffee, for none consumption, go off steadily, at full prices.

Cocoa.—The market is bare of Trinidad, at full prices.

Rice.—We have only a moderate demand for rice, yet prices are supported.

Spices.—The duty having been officially declared at little more than £1125,000, our market has assumed a more animated appearance, prices are upon the advance, nevertheless, standing the supply offering in good. Present rates as under,—Wood of East peckers, 6½ 6s to 6½ 12s; Mid East ditto, 6½ 10s to 6½ 8s; East Kent, 6½ to 6½ 10s; Coosa ditto, 6½ to 6½ 6½; Sussex ditto, 6½ to 6½ 8s; Farling Kents, 6½ to 6½ 8s; Ditto Sussex, 6½ 14s to 6½

Vegetable and Animal Substances.—The supply of meat on sale here to day, yet the demand was steady, on the following terms:—Per 8 lbs, by the carcass: Inferior beef, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; middling ditto, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; prime large ditto, 3s to 3s 2d; prime small ditto, 2s 2d to 2s 4d; large pork, 2s 8d to 3s 6d; inferior mutton, 2s 8d to 3s; middling ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; prime ditto, 3s 8d to 4s; veal, 2s 4d to 3s 8d; and pork, 2s 8d to 4s.

Smithfield.—The market to-day was, on the whole, very moderately supplied with beasts, both as to numbers and quality. The few prime lots on offer sold steadily, at prices full equal to those obtained on Monday last, in other kinds of beasts, a very limited amount of business was transacted. Sheep—the number of which were scanty, viz. 2520—commanded a firm demand, and the late advance in their currencies was supported. In calves, very little was doing, at a decline of from 2d to 4d per 8lbs. Pigs moved off slowly at late rates. Milch cows were quoted at from £16 to £18 the each, including their small calf Per 8lbs, to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 8d to 2s 10d, Second quality ditto, 3s 0d to 3d 4d; Prime large oxen, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; Prime Scots, &c. 3s 10d to 4s 0d Coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 2d to 3s 4d, Second quality ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d, Prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; Prime Southdowns, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; Large coarse calves, 3s 0d to 3s 6d; Prime small ditto, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; Large hogs, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; Small porkers, 3s 8d to 4s 0d. COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The only foreign mail, of any consequence, received during this week, is from the United States of North America, but the commercial news, which the letters, dated to the 1st of that month, communicate, is of the most unsatisfactory character, as regards the next quarter. The demand for British goods continued to be to a fair extent, the stocks were not more than equal to the demand, and the prices generally supported, but the serious reverses to the English manufacturers, were still under the rates at which goods of the same description could be produced within that Republic. The consequence, therefore, in support of demand still continues in all the leading districts, which, added to the great activity prevailing for the Chinese, Colonial, and India markets, gives full employment and fair wages to the industrious classes. The money market was very easy, by no means the same proved the demand for capital in the money market in London, although, as yet, it has not been attended by the slightest symptom of pressure. The exception of the Bank of England money been less abundantly unemployed, would have been the consequence of the rapid improvements now in progress in several branches of commerce. The attention of the capitalist, therefore, is still more directed to the speculations in railways, in interest, undertakings, and for the shares of the principal Railway associations, rather an animated demand exists in this source. A great deal of business again took place in Exchequer Bills, which are now higher prices, and those lines not yet completed are rapidly progressing, money being easily obtained either by the Government or the companies themselves.

Wednesday was the settling day of the speculative accounts on the foreign Stock Exchange, but it was not attended by any consequences of importance. No time therefore, could be fixed on for the Spanish Loan, in consequence of the exception of the Foreign securities. Spanish bonds rather advanced, because the principal purchasers for time do not intend to sell. The Portuguese Government has given the export duties on cotton and corn. Some money has also been again invested in other descriptions of foreign securities, particularly in Danish bonds, which have risen to 103, the Government having plenty of money arriving at higher prices. The market, on the whole, has a healthy appearance.

On the English Stock Exchange very little animation was exhibited amongst the brokers and jobbers in the business of the week, but no decline of any moment occurred, except in the value of English public securities, with the exception of the premium on Exchequer Bills falling to 2s. 2s. 6d. Consols again form the principal feature in the market, under a decidedly plentiful, and it is naturally supposed that this decline will be of short duration.

Before the operations of the week were brought to a close, the value of the English Funds was improved by some public money having been invested, chiefly in the 3½ per Cents, and Minister of Finance having announced his large surplus revenue for the year 1843, and a view to its reduction to Threes, should the state of the money market during next summer be favourable. Parliament was prorogued by Commission on Thursday last, and on the whole, money matters continued, throughout the week, in a state of gradual improvement—a similar observation being applicable to every department of industry throughout the United Kingdom.

THE Committee beg respectfully to state, that, in consequence of the numerous applications of the sick poor, and the loss by death of many of the most bountiful benefactors of this Charity, it stands greatly in need of assistance, and earnestly solicit the affluent in its behalf. Twelve Wards of this noble Institution have been relieved since the establishment of this Institution, and about 6,000 destitute sufferers are annually admitted for relief.

Subscriptions are very thankfully received by the Committee, the Treasurer, and Secretary at the Hospital (where statements of its operations are to be obtained); and by Messrs Drummond, Charing cross; Messrs Coutts and Co., Strand; Messrs Hoare, Fleet-street; and by the neighbouring bankers.

JOHN ROBERTSON, Jun. Secretary.

NELSON'S PATENT OPAQUE GELATINE, Half the Price of Isinglass.—CAUTION. From the increasing demands for NELSON'S OPAQUE GELATINE, many spurious articles are imposed on the Public; to guard against which, and for a protection to purchasers, it is sold in packets only, by most respectable Grocers, Chemists, and others, in packets of 1s., 1s. 6d., 2s. 6d., 5s., 10s., and 15s. and the outer packet, bearing the Patentee's signature. Extract from Dr. Ure's testimonial, June 6, 1842:—"I find Mr. G. Nelson's Patent Opaque Gelatine to be at least equal in strength and purity, if not superior, to the best isinglass, for every culinary purpose; it is entirely free from any marginal oil or acid, such as I have found to exist in other kinds of gelatine in the London market." The Opaque Gelatine as an article well adapted for hotels, taverns, cabin use and ship stores, and a safe and profitable commodity for exportation.—Ernscote Mills, Warwick, and 14, Bucklersbury SHIRTS and STOCKS.—W. E. WHITELOCK, 166, Strand, (Established 20 years), solicits the attention of gentlemen to the shirts he supplies for 40s. 6d. each, including washing. They are made from Marsland's patent shirting, with fine linen fronts, collars, and wrists; the very best wash, long cloth taped for work or clothes by the City hosiers, but what W. E. W. has always paid from 1s. 6d. to 2s. 6d. for), the Coventry and other new fashioned Scotch cravats, sold for 2s. 6d. Also, the new all linen, 10s. 6d., usual price 12s. 6d. The measure requisite is the neck, chest, and wrist size. One seat as a sample to any part of the kingdom, carriage paid, upon receipt of a post office order for the amount, with 1s. in addition as part payment of carriage. W. E. W.'s stocks are unequalled, particularly his everlasting cloth, with bows, 2s. 6d.; long ends, 3s. 6d.; and rich satin, 4s. 6d.; long ends, 5s. 6d. One seat post-free on receiving 1s. in addition, and the length and breadth required in inches. Gentlemen waited upon with samples in any part of London.

FURS at WHOLESALE PRICES.—The RUSSIAN and CANADIAN COMPANY, 244, Regent-street, respectfully inform the nobility and gentry, that they have completed, and have ready for inspection, the LARGEST and most valuable Stock in Europe, consisting of the richest Russian and Siberian Sables, Imperial Ermines, Buenos Ayreas Chinchillas, Lynx, Mink, Fox, Squirrel, &c., all of the largest and finest skins, and selected by experienced buyers on the spot, their own manufactory. Every article warranted to the purchaser, and if not approved of, taken back. The Proprietors feel assured that the system of doing business (that of selling genuine furs at the lowest market prices) which has procured for the Russian and Canadian Company the confidence of royalty, is being rigidly adhered to, will not fail to ensure the recommendation of those ladies who may honour their establishment on each succeeding call.—N.B. Furs repaired, altered, or allowed for in exchange. Prices in plain figures. Observe 244, Regent street (near Oxford-street).

MOURNING -Court, Family, and Complimentary. The Proprietors of the London General Mourning Warehouse, Nos. 247 and 249, Regent-street, beg respectfully to remind families of the requirements occurring when they adopt mourning attire, that every article (of the very best description) requisite for a complete outfit of mourning can be had, at a moment's notice, at their establishment. Widows' and Family Mourning is always kept made up, and a note descriptive of the mourning required, will ensure every thing necessary for the occasion, being sent (in town or country) immediately. Orders out of mourning requisites, new and fashionable Silks, Mantles, Bombazines, Crapes, either in velvet, satin, or merinos, for carriage, promenade, or travelling, will find some of the choicest patterns of the season at this establishment, as well as black Cloths, satins, and duroges for dresses, of a superior texture. The Show Rooms are replete with every novelty that can be required, and the Proprietors, assuming the charge of making dresses, bodies, hoods, bonnets, trimmings, &c. &c.—The London General Mourning Warehouse, Nos. 247 and 249, Regent street (near Oxford-street).

VERSE 2.

Rich Autumn, with her golden store,
May count her treasures o'er and o'er,
And say such wealth did no'er before
The land betide;
But in a snug and shelter'd room,
Where neither mind's nor season's gloom
Can blight our joyous mental bloom,
Give me—FIRESIDE.

Now fruits and flowers, and yellow sheaves,
Are gather'd in, and wither'd leaves
Be all the traveller's eye perceives
In prospect wide;—
How sweet to ramble through some book,
Or chat with social friends in nook
From which we have the cheering look
Of good FIRESIDE.

VERSE 3.

And then to send the glass around,
And have the happy meeting crown'd
With some old ditty's cordial sound,—
Too oft denied
To melodies of greater skill,
That have no power, if they've the will,
To touch our hearts like those that thrill
Round old FIRESIDE.

Then hail the genial season—hail!
O'er mild October's nut-brown ale
Let's sit and hear the merry tale,
Or aught beside,
Which may the passing hour engage;
Of life we'll con the varied page,
And hope for happy, good old age,
By our FIRESIDE.

NEW PROJECT OF NATIONAL CHARITY.—THE HOUSELESS POOR.

At length a movement has been made in the metropolis towards commencing the great work of Christian charity and benevolence in something like an active spirit, and with a beneficent and practical effect. On Monday was held a public meeting, at which noblemen and gentlemen of all shades of opinion joined with a cordiality irrespective of party to take noble part in the promotion of a purpose based on the pure foundations of humanity, and taking its impulses from warm and generous feelings of brotherhood, acknowledged brotherhood with the poor. The meeting was convened for the purpose of commencing the foundation of a series of national edifices to give shelter to the destitute home to the houseless wanderer—a roof to the pale prowler of the night—the sick, the weary, the wretched, and the outcast, who have too long gone neglected by the community, and wanted—and wasted for want of—the sympathies of the competent and the rich. The new impetus given to the exertion of the charitable took its rise from the chivalrous spirit of one kindly individual—a gentleman of the name of Arber—who, fixing the attention of the press upon his humane plan, and putting himself boldly in communication with influential and public spirited men among our nobility, gentry, merchants, and tradesmen, succeeded in forming a committee, and subsequently in calling a meeting, which is likely to be followed by the most beneficial results.

At the meeting in question were taken the wisest preliminary steps towards the establishing of general protection, shelter, and relief, not only to the destitute of the great metropolis, but eventually—if the principle be carried out with spirit—to destitution wherever it exists in England, no matter how remote from its mighty capital. At present, the proposition has not gone beyond the erection of one grand asylum—but it cannot stop there; on the contrary, the initiative resolutions passed by the philanthropists who met upon this first occasion contain instructions to the Committee to call a general public meeting upon a grand scale, to be held at Exeter Hall, and to be presided over—if the prelate accept the honourable invitation propounded to his sacred calling—by the Bishop of London, a natural and powerful protector of the holy cause of Charity, as one of the sacred heads of the Church.

At this great meeting we may expect a more glorious development of the virtuous purpose in hand than could be hoped for from the confined powers of the little band of generous Christians who on Monday last begun their work of love. We may presume—and for the honour of God's cause let us not doubt the fact—that London's prelate will not be the single dignitary of the throne of charity that shall be that day erected in the palatial edifice in the Strand. Will there not be other priests at the altar and other pilgrims at the shrine? More and more of the high clergy of England will surely gather there, and the nobles of the land, and the magnates of its wealth and power, will not then forget the duties which bind the rich unto the poor, and shed upon wealth its lustre while they pour into the heart of poverty its hope. Now, we confess it would give us a supreme and glowing pleasure to find a noble system of benevolence—national institutions of charity—rising out of the advening event. We shall be glad to find mitred priests and reverend pastors, dukes and marquises, coronected lords, breast-starred warriors, naval heroes, the City merchant, the senate, and the bar, assemble upon the broad platform which is that day to support the champions of the else-despairing poor. Nor would the princes of England, and he who gathers so much honour and happiness beside the throne, mingle ungracefully with such a throng. For the mightiest and the richest in such a land as this should never show themselves regardless of the destitution that has suffered without its plaints reaching their ears—or its hidden misery intruding upon their sight—the moment those plaints have found echoes in the hearts of the public, and that misery has been made horribly palpable to the eye of the social world. Not knowing of a frightful poverty they might escape with only that blame of conscience which will suggest to them that they should have been seekers after so much want and wo—but, once knowing it and not relieving it, no censure could exceed their deserving—no picture of heartless moral depravity could overcharge their guilt. And now they can be ignorant no more. The press has sounded the tocsin of sorrow and made the wail of the needy heard in the halls of luxury, and has sent the wretched form of famine stalking into the dwellings of the rich. Hearts and hands must open now. The pale sleepers in the roofless parks and by the shelterless highways—the wan crouchers by the damp doorways of the streets—the shivering sufferers in obscene courts and windless hovels have had their far-spread destitution made a bye-word of reproach to our national civilization; but Charity is throwing off its veil of apathy, and we are now aroused and ashamed. This good result has come, and will be vindicated at the Exeter Hall meeting, or the chivalrous assembly of Monday is a delusion and a scorn.

For the honour of human nature we will not think it so. We believe that the purpose it opened will be followed out—though we are deeply sensible of the amount of prudence, wisdom, and discretion required in the management—apart from legislation—of a new and grand system of active charity—a system which proposes to found institutions and to raise funds. We do not, however, fear the evil contemplated by the Times—namely, that a grand asylum in one district of the metropolis would have the effects of driving the poor into London for shelter and a meal. We think that more institutions would follow the first—that soon they would become suburban as well as metropolitan, and that eventually they would spread their principle into larger towns in the country, and the national benevolence become general and diffused. We look to this result with hope and joy; and we cannot doubt that large funds will be subscribed to follow out the initiatory steps that have been taken. And let it be the business of woman to help this good work. Her sympathies with helpless sorrow should be pure as virtue and warm as love; her gentle influence too can be most eloquently nised with the other sex; nor can the wife, the mother, or the daughter, better modulate the sweet music of persuasion into ears that ever listen to them with delight, than when they attune it to the chords of charity, and teach it to wake kindness and benevolence in sterner hearts. At Exeter Hall let there be such an assemblage of generous English ladies as shall prove how well loveliness and kindliness may harmonize, and that beauty need not be born without a heart. Next to the efficacy of the public, and the personal exertions of the clergy, we look to nothing with so much confidence as to the tender influence and dear enthusiasm of woman, in achieving the object of the new good work that is begun.

And now, having performed our humble duty—in taking the part of the poor—a duty to which we will ever devote ourselves with untiring anxiousness and energy—we cannot bring this article to a close without thanking the magistrates and the press for the part they have taken in disclosing the destitution of the lowly, and the consequent duties of the rich, and paying a high tribute of regard to Mr. Arber for his individual benevolence, and to Lord Dudley Stuart, Lord Ranelagh, Sir De Lacy Evans, the Hon. S. Wortley, Sir J. Copley, Sir B. B. Cabbell, Mr. C. R. Robinson, the Rev. Dr. Spranger, the Rev. Mr. Ward, and others who came forward with them on Monday to bring into practical efficacy a humane and beautiful project of relief to the indigent and shelter to the houseless and forlorn.

SCENE IN THE LONG WALK, WINDSOR GREAT PARK.

On one of the finest mornings during the visit of the Duke and Duchess of Nemours to her Majesty, the Long Walk, in the Great Park, at Windsor, presented the gay and animated scene engraved upon the preceding page. The Queen and her illustrious Consort accompanied by their royal visitors and suites, are on their return from the customary morning airing to the Castle; and the entire party are enjoyed with the picturesque beauty of the right royal domain.

The locality is thus described in the "Journey Book of Berkshire:"—

The Long Walk is generally considered the finest thing of its kind in Europe. A perfectly straight road runs from the principal entrance of the Castle to the top of a commanding hill in the direct south, called Snow Hill, a distance of more than three miles. On each side of the road, which is slightly elevated, is a double row of stately elms, now at their maturity—some, indeed, beginning to show signs of decay. Nothing can be finer than the general effect of this fine avenue of trees. The stranger who is tempted to pursue the road to its termination on the hill, is amply repaid by a most splendid prospect of great extent, and comprehending objects of powerful interest. He is now upon the ridge, whose continuation about a mile to the eastward, leads to a spot which has given a name to the earliest, and, in some respects, the best, descriptive poem of our language, "Cooper's Hill." Windsor Castle appears almost at his feet, as his left is a magnificent expanse of forest scenery; to his right is the Thames, seen beyond the little plain of Runnymede, where Magna Charta was extorted from King John by his barons. The hills in the distance are those of Harrow and Hampstead.

In 1832 a colossal equestrian statue of George III. was erected on the highest point of this hill. The figure terminates the avenue, at a distance of about three miles and a half from the Castle, and, of course, forms a prominent object at every step of the way. It is raised upon a mass of stones intended to represent a rock. The total elevation of the statue and its pedestal is more than fifty feet. The statue itself is twenty-six feet in height. The circumstance, however, of the gradual approach to it through a vista of very lofty trees, and the large forms of the trees immediately surrounding it, greatly diminish the effect of its gigantic proportions. Till the spectator approaches within a hundred yards, he does not feel that the figures are of colossal dimensions. The likeness of the face to George III. is very remarkable.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

[From our own Correspondent.]

PARIS, NOVEMBER 21.

SPAIN.

As I anticipated, those bosom friends—those devoted patriotic friends to their country—the Moderate and ci-devant ultra Liberals, have not only fallen out, but are revengeful enemies. Narvaez openly intrigues against Serrano, and Serrano against Narvaez and the remainder of the partisans of Christina. The reasons given by the Moderates for this sudden change, is the lukewarmness of the Government and the municipal authorities to find out and punish the miscreants who on the 6th fired at General Narvaez. The General greatly pleases the municipality for making no demonstration of satisfaction at his narrow escape, whilst an insult offered to a drummer of the National Guard was made the subject for special report. Narvaez has carried his anger so far as to deprive the country of his services, and has sent to the Queen his resignation as Captain General of Madrid; and, that there might be no misunderstanding as to his real feelings, he refused being present at the grand banquet given by the Queen on the 12th, although Le asserted at the dinner given by the officers of the garrison: "I am inclined to believe that the monster hunters of Narvaez is not so much owing to the continuation of the municipality, as to the increasing popularity of General Serrano, and the refusal of the Queen to receive the resignation of the Lopez administration." Narvaez expected that immediately after the promulgation of the majority of the Queen, her satellites would have come into power, and he literally became the dictator of Spain. Fortunately for the Queen—fortunately for the country—she has proved to Spain have thwarted him in his ambitious designs, and sooner or later [illegible] and determined Government. [illegible] ministers, I will not abandon them." Long may [illegible] recruiting their friends, and intriguing for power. That, at the head of which is M. Gonzales Bravo, held a meeting on the 12th, at the house of M. Bravo, and resolved that the present ministry could not continue to direct the affairs of the country, and that they would support a ministry formed by M. Olozaga, provided the other members professed those patriotic opinions. The democrats demand a ministry composed of Campuzano, Las Navas, and his friends. The Francos de Pantiea have a ministry cut and dried—the Espartcrists another; in short, the Government, the Cortes, and the country is in a state of confusion and disorder.

The insurgents in Gallicia have been obliged to fly, whilst in Catalonia they still hold out. On the 12th a suspension of arms was agreed to between General Sanz and the insurgents of Barcelona, but on the 13th the fighting recommenced, and on the 14th Sanz was making vigorous preparations to attack Barcelona. It was not mistaken in discarding the report of the submission of Ametller: it now appears that Ametller, who is at the head of 4000 men, has shut himself up in the Fort of Figueras. On the 12th, the forts of Figueras and the neighbouring villages were put in requisition to convey to the fort large supplies of provisions. Several hundred head of cattle were taken in, also a large supply of corn and rice. The garrison of Figueras is included in the capitulation of Gerona, joined Ametller on the 12th. Prim, who has possession of the town of Figueras, has barricaded all the roads leading to the fort. Prim is greatly blamed for the facility allowed to the insurgents to concentrate themselves in Figueras; it is presumed for a long time. He expected that the surrender of Gerona would have hastened that of Barcelona, but he has been deceived, for the officers sent by Ametller to Barcelona had a narrow escape for their lives, when they announced that Gerona had capitulated. Several of the members of the Junta of Gerona have sought refuge in France.

ITALY.

Private letters from the frontiers of Italy of the 5th, state that a large body of insurgents had congregated near Rimini, and sought to form a junction with the Neapolitan political refugees. The chiefs of these bands were staying at Malta, Corfu and Corfoo. It is said that the insurgents intended to attempt a landing between Po and Marechia. Ferrara was in a state of great agitation. A few days since a shot was fired at the box of the Cardinal Legate, in the theatre of Ferrara. The Director of the Police of Rome had left for Bologna, in order to assist the Military Commander of that city. Five of the insurgents have been condemned to death by the military commission, and several others sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in irons. Much discontent was expressed throughout Italy at the consent given by the Grand Duke of Tuscany for the extradition of M. Viola de Bologna, one of the chiefs of the insurrection.

The sale of the magnificent and unique picture gallery of the late Cardinal Fesch is fixed for the month of March next, at Rome; the gallery contains, amongst other chefs-d'œuvre, some rare productions from such masters as Holbein, Teniers, Rembrandt, Rubens, Van Dyck, Guido, &c. &c.

GERMANY.

An agent of Messrs. Clegg and Samuda, the inventors of Atmospheric Railways, reached Berlin on the 12th, and proposed to the Government to construct the line of lower Silesia and Prussia. The engineer has received a most gracious and favourable answer to this application, but has consented that they should lay down a line from Berlin to Charlottenburg. Should this succeed, they will have the contract for Lower Silesia.

The rebuilding of the Opera of Baden is being [illegible] and is expected to be finished by the month of September next year, and immediately on the 12th of October, the birthday of the King.

On the 1st the subscription books for the construction of the Saxon-Silesian railways were opened at Leipsic, and the amount required immediately filled up. Thus this great line, which traverses Germany from west to east, will be soon in [illegible] the line from Bonn to Cologne will be opened before the end of the year.

The ex-King of Holland, with his wife, and a numerous suite, took up their winter abode at Berlin, on the 10th.

FRANKFORT, NOV. 13.—A great reform is intended in the military affairs of Bavaria, Wurtemburg, and Baden. It consists in the establishment of a militia, similar to the Prussian Landwehr.

FRANCE.

It is reported to-day—but I doubt very much its truth—that a serious misunderstanding has arisen between M. Thiers and M. Guizot, and that the former gentleman has determined on the discussion on the address to attack the extension of the works at the fortifications, principally those at Vincennes and Saint Maur. M. Thiers says that he is desirous of declaring all share or responsibility of such of the works as were not commenced or decided on during his administration.

The following statistical account of the foreign commerce of France, published in the Moniteur, will be found highly interesting. It embraces from 1827 to 1841 inclusive. Of the general commerce, the annual imports were, taking the average, 790,200,000f., and the exports 783,400,000f., making a total of the two, 1,573,600,000f. Of the special commerce the imports were 548,500,000f., the exports 568,000,000f., and the total 1,116,500,000f. In the special commerce the principal imports were cotton, silk, colonial sugar, and common woods; the exports, silk, cotton, woollen and linen manufactured goods, wines and dressed skins. England during this period received 94,000,000f. worth of French merchandise, and returned other ones to the amount of 70,000,000f. The balance of trade with Spain was in favour of France to the amount of 34,000,000f., and with Switzerland, 17,000,000f. The interchanges of commerce between France and America, the German Union, the Netherlands, Tuscany, and the Roman States, were very nearly upon an equal balance. It was with Belgium, Sardinia, Russia, and British India, that the imports exceeded the exports. From 1827 to 1841, the receipts of the Customs amounted upon an average to the sum of 109,807,396f., and since 1836 this sum has uniformly been exceeded. The amount in 1841 was 137,000,000f. In the first five years of the fifteen the average was 107,000,000 only; in the second five years it was 109,500,000f. The annual receipts for Duties on imported threads was nearly 55,000,000f. The Customs and Salt Duties gave an annual average of 164,870,000f., taken upon the whole period.

Last evening it was reported in many circles that Abd-el-Kader had fallen into the hands of the French: on inquiring this morning I found that no such news had reached the Government. On the other hand, this much is certain, that the Age of Timesens, who was appointed by France, had deserted with all his followers, plundering every place on his road. He is believed to have crossed the Morocco frontier.

Count Molé is staying at Havre, from whence he will embark for England.

Viscount Chateaubriand has left Paris for London.

The King of Sweden has sent to General Narsape, military commander of the Lower Pyrenees, the decoration of Commander Grand Cross of the Order of the Sword.

The following are the numbers of students who have entered during the present year the four principal colleges in Paris:—Charlemagne, 704 to 795; Saint Louis, 790 to 880; Louis le Grand, 1088 to 1095; Henri IV., 740 to 790.

"The First Fireside," a social ballad, by J. A. Wade, published in the last ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, is literally sung the round of the English circles in Paris. It is greatly admired, and, I have not the least doubt, will become popular on the Continent.

"Don Sebastian," by Donizetti, continues to be played to overflowing houses at the Grand Opera; its third representation produced upwards of 6000 francs. Our musical world is much divided in opinion as to its merits, but it is generally acknowledged that the composition of Marschner is better adapted to the Italian than the French stage. The music in "Don Sebastian" throughout is melodious, but there are a great many reminiscences. The third act is rather triste, but the fourth is truly beautiful, particularly a trio—every night repeated. A rather amusing anecdote is related as connected with this trio. During the third act, one of our principal music publishers, Mr. S., treated for the copyright of the music with Donizetti—it was a hard bargain on both sides, and not concluded when the fourth act began. Mr. S. retired to the boxes, and believing that he was the fortunate proprietor of the copyright, he applauded the trio with all his might. At the moment a friend came into the box and informed S. that the Brothers Escudier had agreed for the partition with Donizetti; the enraged publisher mounted quatre-à-quatre to the abode of the rois, and whilst the preteres were crying out "his, his," he bellowed with the full force of his lungs "Assez, Assez, and from all parts of the house was now heard "A la porte, A la porte." S. retired, but true trio was not heard the second time.

"Maria de Rohan" was most enthusiastically received at the Italian Opera. Truly, Donizetti is a mighty man. On the 18th of October, 1842, he brought out, in Paris, his "Linda de Chamouni," and on the 6th of January, 1843, "Don Pasquale." The 3rd of June, 1843, "Maria de Rohan;" and the 13th November, 1843, "Don Sebastian," in Paris. Besides, preparing for San Carlo at Naples, "Catarina, Corraro," in three acts; writing for the Imperial Chapel of Vienna, a "Miserere," composed of nine parts, [illegible] recits, chœurs, &c., &c., in all 17 pieces, and composing an "Ave Maria," for five voices. This is what the Maitre de Chapelle of the Emperor of Austria, has delivered to the musical world during 18 months—and the same activity of Figaro is nothing compared to it. Donizetti ci-devant Donizetti ré—Donizetti fa—Donizetti gui; presto l'opera serie, presto l'opera ouffa, subito il miscrere!!! Ormè!!! Pago a la volta, per cadit 1! per cadit 1a!

The rehearsals have recommenced at the Grand Opera, for the ballet, at present called, "Les Caprices," the music by Burgmuller, Deldevez, and Adolphe Adam, by the by, the opera by the latter, in two acts, of which, report speaks in the highest terms, will be brought out next week at the Opera Comique. I forgot to mention that Donizetti has dedicated "Don Sebastian" to the Queen of Portugal.

"Shakspeare's Midsummer Night's Dream," put to music by Mendelssohn, has been performed four successive nights at the Baden Opera with the greatest applause.

Fanny Cerito has had an immense success at Rome, in the ballet, "Le Lac des Fées." She was well seconded by Saint Leon. Prince Pignatowski is now in Rome, directing at the theatre Apollo, the last written opera, "Ineldia dei Lambertazzi." "I Lombardi," by Verdi, was most favourably received at the Pergola of Florence; the principal characters were supported by Frezzolini, Poggi, and Gardoni. Mario is expected in a few days in Vienna, goes to Dresden, and from thence to Prague.

Mendelssohn's oratorio, "Paulus," has been translated into Italian by the Marquis Pepoli, Neapolitan. Mr. Kuhen has been named Maitre de Chapelle to he Grand Duke of Mecklenburg.

BELGIUM.

BRUSSELS, Nov. 15.—If we are correctly informed, the government will propose the adoption of a system of differential duties. Its system is moderate, and has especially in view to encourage direct arrivals. We will give an example (choosing cotton) of the manner in which the ministerial plan generally proceeds. The duty on cotton will be five centimes per 100 kilogrammes when it is imported directly under the national flag, and 1 franc 70 centimes when it is imported by a foreign vessel. The government, it is thought, will not bring out the adoption of the system of differential duties to propose something precise concerning the organization of a society of commerce. It seems that in the budget of ways and means which is going to be laid before the Chambers can even now anticipate without considerable apprehension. The only child of the reigning King of Denmark is the Prince Royal, who is without male issue, which is also the case with the King's brother, Prince Ferdinand, the next in succession. After these, the next heir to the throne is the Prince Frederick William of Hesse Cassel, the son of the Princess Louise Charlotte, sister of the Danish King, and of the Landgrave William of Hesse. Prince Frederick William is married to a daughter of the Emperor Nicholas.

WALLACHIA

A letter from the frontiers of Turkey, dated Nov. 2, published in the Allgemeine Zeitung of the 13th inst, states that according to report Prince Bibesco's long residence at Constantinople is caused by his desire to purchase the country of Wallachia from the Sultan. He is said to have offered for it 8,000,000 gulden, and the Emperor Nicholas is said to have guaranteed a loan to that amount on condition that the Prince places the country in pawn for the sum, and receives into it a Russian force till the whole debt be paid.

HUNGARY.

Great riots have taken place in the Comitat of Sjatamar. The populace wished to carry the election of the Opposition candidates by main force. The Comitat, however, annulled their return, and replaced them with others. When the Deputies arrived at Pesth young Hungary accompanied them with a charivari from Pesth to Presburg. This charivari was repeated at night, and the Hotel of the Deputies was assailed with stones. A lay figure, or rather a Guy, was made, and the following questions addressed to it:—"Who is the greatest rogue in Hungary?"—"Who is the greatest traitor?"—To these the mob replied, by shouting the names of the Deputies. Being driven away by the armed force, the crowd went to the residence of Count Jichy, and broke all the windows with stones.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Papers to the 19th September have been received, and deserve notice as conveying even more gratifying intelligence than the last; for the more formidable and disaffected leaders of the Boers are stated to have since assented to the proposals of the British Commissioner, Mr. Cloete. (We refer our readers to an engraving in a former number of our paper with reference to the Cape.

AMERICA.

The packet-ship Oxford, Captain Rathbone, arrived at Liverpool on Sunday night, after an unusually fine run of seventeen days from New York. General Bertrand, who is on a tour through the Union, had arrived in New York, and was entertained by the French residents in that city with a dinner at Astor-house The kindness which he experienced appears to have gratified him exceedingly.

At Laguna active preparations are making for hostilities with Yucatan, which it is thought would be shortly commenced. The harbour had been closed by order of Santa Anna, and no vessels arriving from Campeachy, either with cargoes or in search of logwood, were allowed to enter.

The yellow fever is raging with fatal violence at Tobasco, and had carried off a number of the inhabitants.

By the arrival of the fast-sailing ship Ardonrdach, Captain Hackstaff, after a quick voyage of eighteen days, we have received New York papers of the 3rd instant.

The cotton market was inactive and there was no alteration in flour or grain. Ashes were in demand at 5 dollars 25 cents. to 5 dollars 28 cents. for pearls, and 4 dollars 50 cents. for pots. There was nothing of importance done in the foreign bill market; bills on London were held at 108 to 108½, and on France at 5f. 15c. to 5f. 20c.

In Canada, the Provincial Parliament was very active. A bill for the suppression of secret societies had passed in committee of the whole house. Another, for the prevention of party processions, said to be aimed at the Orange societies, had excited very great discussion. They had also a bill before them for the regulation of steam-boats in the province, which forbids the use of high-pressure engines.

By an arrival at Charleston, from Havannah, we learn that the newly-appointed Governor of Cuba had arrived, and would be installed in office the day the vessel bringing the news left.

The New York Sun announces the loss of the steamer Sarah Barnes, and sixteen lives. It appears that on the 24th ult., at noon, she crossed the Galveston bar, for the port of New York. On the following morning a leak was discovered in the hold. At nine A.M., when about 75 miles from Galveston, it was found that the water increased on the pumps, and the captain determined to run her on the nearest shore. At half-past two P.M., the water, notwithstanding their exertions, had ascended to the fires and the engine. Further efforts to counteract the leak were unavailing, and to save their lives became the concern of all. They set about constructing rafts of the cotton bales—four in all. Orders were given to cast off the boat's painter, and while doing this she sank, it being then 45 minutes past four in the afternoon. There were on board altogether thirty souls —of these, eighteen were got on the rafts, and twelve took to the sea. Of the former about five were saved, after drifting about three days and three nights. Two of them landed on Galveston Island, and the other three on Boldvair Point. Of the latter, but three reached.

A New York paper states that Illinois is now on the road to extraordinary prosperity. She has put her debtin train of liquidation. She has obtained the means of completing one of the most important public works in the whole country.

WEST INDIES.

The West India accounts, brought by the Royal Mail Company's steamer, Tweed, are very barren of information. The Jamaica papers allude to the beneficial effect of the late rains. The crops were looking well, and two vessels had arrived with labourers from the coast of Africa. The House of Assembly was to be opened two days after the departure of the Tweed, but nothing had transpired concerning the probable topics of the Governor's speech. At Demerara there had been a difference, amounting even to an assault, between the Roman Catholic Bishop, Dr. Clancy, and a priest, as to the performance of the ordinary service of the church, and this had been a subject of general conversation and controversy in the settlement. Commercially speaking, the prospects of the colony (Demerara), were improving.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

THE QUEEN V. SIR JOSEPH WALMSLEY.

This was an information filed by the Attorney-General, to recover back a sum of £4600 from the defendant, as money had and received by the defendant to the use of the Crown. Sir Joseph Walmsley advanced a large sum of money to a maltster named Armitage, and had in his possession a large quantity of malt, the property of Armitage. An extent issued for malt duties due by Armitage, and the corn which the plaintiff held, and on which he claimed a lien, was seized for the Crown. The solicitor for the crown, by letter, directed Sir Joseph Walmley to sell the corn; and he did so, retaining the amount due to him, and paying over the surplus (a sum of £400) to the officers of the Crown. It was afterwards settled, by a case in this court, that the lien on property legally seized by the Crown could not prevail against the claims of the Crown, and Sir Joseph Walmsley was called upon to refund the money he had received and appropriated in payment of his own debt. There was a verdict for the Crown for the amount claimed.—On Tuesday, the Attorney-General shewed cause against the rule obtained to set aside the verdict for the Crown; and Mr. Kelly and Mr. Crompton having been heard in support of the rule, the court said, that the property legally seized when the rule was granted, did not apply. The verdict for the Crown was therefore to stand, and the rule conditional was discharged.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

In the case of the Queen v. Forbes Mr. Neill, the defendant appeared to receive judgment for an assault on Mr. Abel Smith.

ROLLS COURT.

On Tuesday the arguments in the case of the Duke of Brunswick v. the King of Hanover, were commenced, and occupied the court for several days; but, finally, judgment was postponed.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.

IN RE CHARLES LOUIS DE BOURBON, COMMONLY KNOWN AS THE DUKE OF NORMANDY.

The Duke of Normandy was represented by Mr. Nicholls for Mr. Barrit, an upholsterer, of Camberwell green, and by a creditor in person. He was supported by Messrs. Cooke and Woodroffe.—The insolvent, whose singular claims to the throne of France have been before the public for some time, came into court on Tuesday, accompanied by the Count de la Barre, Mr. Pater, of Symond's Inn, his solicitor, and other friends. He professes to be the lawful son and heir of Louis XVI., who was brought to have died in the Tower of the Temple. He is allowed to bear a very strong resemblance to the Bourbon family, and his mien and bearing are characteristic of his pretensions. The court was much crowded. His schedule is a somewhat extraordinary document. In addition to his claim as the Dauphin of France to the throne of that kingdom, he inserts all his right and interest in the Castle of St Cloud and the Castle of Rambouillet, near Paris, and late personal property which were purchased by his mother, Marie Antoinette, late Queen of France, and her private property, at a cost of eighty thousand francs. There is entered also for the benefit of his creditors, all his right and interest to the sum of about £200,000 in the funds of the English Government, being the value of certain ships which were deposited with Admiral Hood by the authorities of Toulon in the year 1793, by way of trust, for the benefit of Louis XVII., the Dauphin of France. It appeared that he had been in custody on the Queen's Prison since March last, during which period he had been allowed by the court from the unclaimed dividends, under the 18th section, the sum of £ The agreement of his debts was £2200 3s. 3d. Those twice entered were in all £911, leaving the debts for which he had received consideration £4,959 2s. 2d. There were no profits and no debts due to him. His insolvency, or rather his inability to pay his debts—for he declared himself solvent—was ascribed to his not having been permitted to complete an invention for warlike purpose, which he intended to offer the British Government, who had not satisfied his just claims in other respects, and he remained in consequence of the seizure of his property by a creditor before the invention was perfected.—Mr. Nicholls examined the insolvent at some length, to ascertain whether there was any and what property which might be obtained for the benefit of the creditors. The result was that his title to the possession of the property mentioned in the schedule depended upon those papers and documents which related to his identity, signed by his royal father in the Tower of the Temple previous to his being seized by Louis Philippe in 1830 when he was before the French public to obtain justice. The Court directed amendments required by the creditors to be made in the schedule. The insolvent will be then discharged.

COUNTRY NEWS.

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE.—TURN-OUT OF POWER-LOOM WEAVERS.—The weavers in the employ of Messrs. Hayley, of Stalybridge, turned out on Friday morning, for an advance of one penny per cut. The hands still continue out. The turn-out at Messrs. Rayner's, of Ashton, still continues. Some few, however, have gone in, but have had to be guarded to and from work by the police. In consequence of many of the weavers congregating in the public streets, the deputy constable has issued bills, giving notice that any person obstructing the footpath will be proceeded against according to law.

BIRMINGHAM.—COMPLETE SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT.—The Executive Council of the complete Suffrage Union met at Birmingham on Monday afternoon, the President in the Chair. The sub-committee, to whom it was remitted to consider the best means for obtaining the support of the constituencies to Mr. Crawford's proposal to move amendments that the supplies be withheld until the grievances of the people are heard and redressed, reported that they had considered the subject and had resolved to recommend that electors and non-electors in every borough should send distinct memorials requesting their representatives in Parliament to give effect to it.

BUCKINGHAM.—POACHERS.—We regret to learn that a serious affray, between Lord Galloway's gamekeeper and a party of poachers took place on the farm of Penkiln, in Sorbie parish, on Monday night last. It appears that on that night Mr. Wright, his brother-in-law, and apprentice on his rounds with five assistants, fell in with a party of eight poachers, engaged in "netting" hares. They were armed with pitchforks and sticks, and had a double-barrelled gun among them, part of which having also been pressed into service. The keepers having captured one of them, his companions made a desperate attempt at his rescue, in which they succeeded, having, we regret to learn, struck down and severely wounded Mr. Wright on the head and different parts of the body.

BERKSHIRE.—ANOTHER INCENDIARY FIRE AT TILEHURST.—On Friday se'nnight, a fire broke out at Church-end Farm, Tilehurst, about three miles from Reading, and in a short time destroyed a barn full of wheat, the stables, in which were four horses, all of whom were burnt to death, the outbuildings, and several pigs. There cannot be a doubt that the miscreant who set fire to the Bareford's Farm in the same parish, about a mile and a half distant, about a week before, committed the crime on Friday night. A very bad feeling evidently exists in this extensive parish, and great alarm is felt by all owners of agricultural property.

LANCASHIRE.—CHURCH ROBBERIES.—On the 11th inst. the church at Walkden Moor, in the township of Worsley, near Manchester, was sacrilegiously broken into and entered, and the clergyman's surplices, a pint bottle of wine, wax candles, and other articles, were stolen. On the 13th instant, the parish church of Stretford, near Manchester, was also entered, and the surplices, an aquavitæ coat, and five bottles of port wine were stolen. A reward of £5 has been offered for the apprehension of the offender.

ACCIDENT AT THE MANCHESTER THEATRE.—On Friday se'nnight, The Tempest was performed at this theatre. As Miss Gardiner, who played Ariel, was, in the first scene, swinging at some distance above the stage, the wire by which she was suspended snapped, and she was precipitated to the ground. She was but slightly injured.

OLDHAM.—A great portion of the mill of Mr. John Lees, Primrose-hill, Old ham, together with a considerable quantity of valuable machinery, were consumed on Thursday se'nnight, by a conflagration, the cause of which remains at present unknown, but is believed to have been accidental. The property destroyed is estimated at about £5,000.

RUTLAND.—On the night of the 18th an incendiary fire occurred on the premises of Mr. Henry Stanson, Craven Hotel, Oakham; and on the night of the 14th several stacks of wheat, barley, and oats, and a quantity of hay and straw, were wilfully destroyed by fire at Castle Farm, Tattersal, Lincolnshire; a reward of £50 for discovery has been offered by Earl Fortescue, a further reward of £50 by Mr. Cork Chandler, the tenant, and her Majesty's pardon is also promised to any person for such information as may lead to the apprehension and conviction of the incendiaries.

SALISBURY ELECTION.—The contest for the representation of Salisbury has been attended with the greatest activity and excitement. The leading members of the Anti-Corn Law League have been for several days in the city, daily addressing crowded audiences. Such was the apprehension of violence on the part of the opposite party, that they applied for a body of the London police and a troop of cavalry, to ensure the protection of the voters. The prominent supporters of Mr. Bouverie, the free-trade candidate, and son of Earl Radnor, on the other hand, allege that London prizefighters and notorious bribers have been imported to Salisbury by the friends of Mr. Campbell, the Conservative candidate. The nomination took place on Wednesday, when the candidates having addressed the electors, a show of hands was taken, which was declared to be in favour of Mr. Bouverie, and a poll was demanded on behalf of Mr. Campbell, which commenced on Thursday morning at eight o'clock.

CLOSE OF THE POLL.

ST. ALBAN'S.—At a meeting of the corporation of St. Alban's, on the 9th inst. Mr Alderman William Langley was unanimously elected Mayor of the borough for the ensuing year.

STATE OF SOUTH WALES. The Special Commissioners have been in Haverfordwest prosecuting their inquiries into the grievances of which the people complain in this district since Monday. Their inquiry was conducted in the grand jury-room in the Town-hall. A number of persons have been before them detailing their grievances, which, however, eventually all resolve themselves into one the abject poverty of the people. The commissioners proceeded to Narberth on Saturday, to Newcastle Emlyn on Monday, to Cardigan on Wednesday, and they were to be at Aberystwith yesterday.

THE STATE PROSECUTIONS. The scenes of these memorable Prosecutions will be recorded by other and than that of the pen, artists are seated in every nook busy in conveying the features of the scene to those far away; and the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS has commissioned the eminent artist Mr. Jones, of Cannon-row, London, to limn the visages of judges, jury, counsel, conspirators, and all concerned. Much amusement was caused to the unemployed members of the Bar as they recognised the features of their elder and more celebrated brethren growing into life beneath the artist's pencil.—Times, November 20.

SONGS BY MACLISE.—Madame Dulcken, the accomplished pianiste, gave the first of these delightful treats, on Wednesday night, to a numerous assemblage of her friends and patrons at her residence in Harley-street. The bill of fare was such as the extreme—some of the oldest morceaux of Mozart, Hummel, Mendelssohn, and Weber being served up with a gusto that was relished highly by a company of excellent palates. Weber's "Sonata in D Minor," and Mozart's Quartet (the 8th) were gems of the highest value. Madame Dulcken, in the former, and Mr. Willey, in the latter, performed admirably. M. Sainton and Mr. Schelles, in the latter and unobtrusive manner, conducted the concert like that which he is—a perfect musician and a modest man.

FIRE AT LUTON HOO.—On Friday an address, numerously signed by the inhabitants of Luton, was presented to the Marquis of Bute, sympathising with his lordship on the destruction of his princely mansion, and congratulating him on the rescue of the splendid pictures and valuable library. The noble marquis, in reply, thanked his neighbours, of all classes, for having exposed their lives in the preservation of his property; and his lordship took occasion to contradict the report of the late fire having been open the entire day. His lordship said he believed, that "there never was an occasion on which the working-classes, both men and women, exerted themselves more decidedly and cordially.

We understand that Mr. Duncan M'Neill, Lord Advocate for Scotland, has been elected Dean of the Faculty by a large majority. This is the only instance of such an honour having been conferred on a Lord Advocate since the time of Lord Melville.

LITERATURE.

THE COMIC ALMANACK FOR 1844.

Rigdum Funnidos's Budget for the coming year is, all things considered, as attractive as ever. True it is that other wits, whose province it is to "shoot folly as it flies," have occasionally anticipated the patriarchal Rigdum in cooking up his almanack; and the arrangement is scarcely so unique in editorial manœuvrerie as in former years. Nevertheless, "the Ephemeris in Jest and Earnest" for 1844 is rich in original drollery and humour from beginning to end. The public folly—great enough, it must be owned—are unsparingly ridiculed; and the weak points of private life are pleasantly quizzed. We quote a few specimens.

TEN THOUSAND A-YEAR.
THE TAX ON PROPERTY.

There's a something agreeable in the idea
Of having for income "Ten Thousand a-Year."

But property, while it possesses its beauties,
Is burdened not only with rights but with duties.
It well may be said that the strongest of backs
Is bent with the weight of the Property Tax.
"Ten Thousand a-Year" is expected to sport
A carriage of every conceivable sort;
A britchska, a Clarence, landau, and pleasunce,
He must purchase as fast as the makers invent 'em.
Each vehicle fashion compels him to take,
Till "Ten Thousand a-Year" is reduced to a break.
Of lazy domestics, in livry and out,
A tribe must he kept to be lounging about.
On wages exorbita nt enough, it is true,
They ye nothing on earth—but their master—to do.
The larder, as well as the pockets, they clear:
'Tis part of the tax on "Ten Thousand a-Year."

The blessings of wealth would be given in vain,
To one who'd not swim all his friends in champagne:
His dinners must needs be the talk of the season,
As feasts of which ear can be thought—and with reason.
As a lavished lacquey, perchance, they may wait
Some usurer, having a lien on the plate
Who will not allow it to pass from his sight,
Although to its owner its lent for the night:
The usurer gracefully keeps in the rear,
Not to bar the effect of "Ten Thousand a-Year."

Then bails must be given the selons to fill,
And run he met in a graceful quadrille:
'Tis sweet, e'en on bankruptcy's margin to stand,
While hailed by the music of dun's loud hand.
Such luxuries can't be succeeded as dear
To one who's possessed of "Ten Thousand a-Year."

Without a town mansion, a park, and a seat,
The rich man's establishment is not complete;
But, still, on an annual tour he must roam;
His house must on no account serve for his home;
For servants, its comforts may do very well,
He must wander abroad to some foreign hotel.
When the season is over, in town to appear
Would be très mauvais goût if "Ten Thousand a-Year."

Extravagant family, daughters and sons,
Will distant connections who pester like duns,
On the strength of the fact that their wealthy relation Can't suffer their wants to reflect on his station—
The family's dignity, honour, and pride;
And many a heavy incumbrance beside,
Of which but a few on the surface appear,
All make up the tax on "Ten Thousand a-Year."

The squibbery upon the "things fitting" for an almanack is very smart; et cæt.—

PREDICTIONS FOR JANUARY.—In examining the horoscope, it seems to embrace a wide scope of horrors. There will be dark days for England, which we must be prepared for by lighting candles. After New Year's Day there will be many bowls, and Turkey will be torn to pieces by domestic violence.

THE GARDEN.—If anything is done in the garden at this time of the year, perhaps the best thing will be to run about in it. Do not attempt to move any of your trees, but keep your junior branches moving as much as possible. This is the best time to take your shrub in-doors; but it should be rum-shrub, watered in moderation, and taken at night over a cheerful fire.

RECISIONS IN HILARY TERM.

The property in a lodger's possession may be seized for rent due from a tenant, but it does not appear that the longer s.s.f possession can legally be taken away from him

A flaw in a lease will not always let in the heir, but the air is frequently let in by a flaw in the building.

When a conveyance has already sufficient parties, it has been decided that the remainder-man may be shut out. This was decided in the case of Podger versus the driver and conductor of the Atlas omnibus.

If a party offers to pledge himself, semble, that a pawnbroker cannot be compelled to take him in, though it is done frequently.

It is not yet decided whether the new act for the protection of the Queen's person, which inflicts a penalty for presenting fire-arms at the Queen's person, does or does not extend to the sentinels on duty, who present arms at her Majesty whenever she leaves the palace.

The New Poor Law Act, prohibiting all out-door relief, does not apply to trees, which may be re-leaved out of doors at the usual period.

It is a question whether, by the recent law, which says that all children under five are to be carried gratuitously in any stage-carriage, a mother may insist on claiming free passage for four children by any public conveyance.

It has been decided that the act giving the net proceeds of a slave ship to the captors, does not mean that they are only entitled to the fish caught in nets on board the vessel.

The Court of Queen's Bench has declared that a minor under the age of ten years cannot legally be a miner since the passing of the Mines and Collieries' Regulation Act.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS.

Patents will, it is expected, be granted—

To Sir Robert Peel, for a new and most efficacious manner of sweeping by machinery, as exemplified in his very sweeping machinery of the Income Tax.

To Lady Sale, for carrying Britannia metal to a high degree of perfection

To Drs. Newman and Pusey, for an entirely new method of introducing heat into churches.

To Lord Brougham, for the application of rotatory motion, with a view of obtaining power

To the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for an extension of the use of the screw, so as to augment its pressure.

To the Poor Law Commissioners, for a new method of diminishing pauperism by reducing the number of paupers; and also for an improved process of grinding.

To Daniel O'Connell, for a most effectual method of draining Ireland.

FACTS WORTH REMEMBERING.

IN JANUARY.—That on the 8th, fire insurance policies must be attended to; and that, although honesty is the best policy, it will not be available in case of fire.

FEBRUARY.—That, on the 7th, Dr. Maskelyne died; but as we do not know how to pronounce an opinion on this Maskelyne, it is better for us to remain neuter.

MARCH.—That the month is a stormy one at sea, causing leaks in ships, and that, on the 1st, being St. David's day, leeks are worn in the hat by Welshmen.

APRIL.—That the assessed tax papers are sold at cost price in the month, and that last year 1,000,000 were so sold at a halfpenny per sheet.

MAY.—That on the 14th, Wesley was married, in 1749, and that, when it was found he could not be pulled with the small-pox, the invention itself may be pulled against any other.

JUNE.—That the sun is before the clock on the 7th, which may be remedied by placing the clock before the sun. Mem. It will do no good to place it before the sun.

JULY.—That the days decrease in the course of the month; and that, on the 3rd of July, 1830, Algiers lost a Dey altogether

AUGUST.—That Napoleon was born on the 15th, and Andrew Marvel on the 16th, but that the former was really a greater marvel than the latter

SEPTEMBER.—Your grapes will now begin to want looking after. If you do not bag them yourself, and your vine happens to be in an exposed situation, you may expect that some one will come and bag them for you.

OCTOBER.—The melons can only be raised in hot beds; and, of course, the hotter the bed the better the melons. Some fruit gardeners recommend a layer of cinders; but red hot ashes, enclosed in a warming pan, will heat your bed quicker and more lightning. It is usual to cover the bed over with a frame, with panes of glass in it; a good thick counterpane would perhaps be more effective.

NOVEMBER.—The 5th is Guy Fawkes day, which is commemorative of an attempt to blow up the Houses of Parliament on the 5th of November, 1605.

DECEMBER.—That the close of the year is the proper time to begin a system of keeping accounts, for you will have plenty of accounts to begin to enable you to commence keeping them.

POPULAR ERRORS.

Sandwich is not famous for the Sandwiches.

Venetian blinds are not imported from Venice.

The captain of a steamer, when at his post, is not a post-captain.

The sense of pain is not the same in each sharp without the application of blunt.

It is an error to suppose that the stature of man is diminished, for the length men go to in the present day was never surpassed. The tallest men are to be found in Lincolnshire.

Jerusalem artichokes do not come from Jerusalem. They are not called artichokes, because any one who makes a hearty meal on them will run the chance of being choked.

It is a vulgar error that beer is turned sour by thunder. The fact is that beer may be turned sour by lightning, which does not know how to conduct itself.

Home made articles are not always the best; and, indeed, when made at home, they are often so mysterious, that there is really no making them out.

George Cruikshank's illustrative etchings are in his best vein, and he has adopted the quaint old fashion of making them so many talking pictures. "The Great Anti-Temperance Meeting," with the impersonated wines and liquors, is the acme of drollery. Small beer, punch, rum, and old Tom, are essentially and spiritedly characteristic. "The Tee-to-tal Procession," a sort of Temperance pageant in the means of spending £10,000 a-year, will convulse many a fireside circle with laughter. Its comic minutiæ are exhaustless. "The Charity Ball Dancing for the Million" is capital. "The Height of Speculation, Groundless Expectations," is an excellent burlesque on the "Aerial" hoax upon gullibility. It is a most masterly composition, independent of its broad satire. "The Royal Academy" is a graphic paraphrase on the well-known print of the Village Schoolmaster. "Guy Fawkes" treated classically, an unexhibited cartoon, is a neat piece of quizzing by George Cruikshank. These are the only illustrations we can point out to the reader, but the entire series is in Cruikshank's raciest manner, almost inexhaustible in little points of humour, and original to a line. We need scarcely add our hearty commendation of this very lively budget of fun.

THE BOTANIC GARDEN, By B. Maund, F.L.S. R. Groombridge. The publications of this popular work, now in course of publication, will, doubtless, be very acceptable to a large class of purchasers. Each number is illustrated with four engravings of plants, carefully coloured.

THE DICTIONARY OF TRADE, COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION. By G. Francis, F.L.S., &c. W. Britain.

This work, originally published in numbers, now forms a neat volume. It explains the objects, terms, statistics, laws, and regulations of the Exchange, Customs, public affairs, banking, moneys, weights, shipping, fisheries, imports, exports, book-keeping, commercial geography, national flags, and the general affairs of business; the whole illustrated by 400 engravings. The definitions appear to be carefully executed, although brief, they contain many valuable facts and statistics; making the book, altogether, a very useful contribution to cheap literature. As a specimen of the illustrations, we may state that, under "New Zealand," are engraved the seal and flag of that promising colony.

CURIOSITIES OF MODERN TRAVEL. D. Bogue.

This little Book consists of incidents and adventures sliced from works published during the present year; which feature the compiler observes "could not reasonably be expected to be wisely withholds at whose cost. A volume culled from so rich a store of materials could not fail to be attractive, set off as it is by several smart illustrations; and it will, doubtless, prove an acceptable holiday present.

ETIQUETTE OF COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE. D. Bogue.

To "drink tea by stratagem," and "tell the clock by algebra," were but minor exploits compared with the object of this brochure, which is a sort of Aerial railway for the uninitiated into "the blissful state." Although, in common parlance, every man should speak of the fair as he has found it, the maxim will hardly hold good in this case, else "the Etiquette" may be called to book for many disappointments and crosses. Jesting apart, there are some serviceable hints in this little tome.

AUSTRALIA; Its History and Present Condition. By the Rev. W. Burns.

Priddy, M.A.

This is a well-chosen volume of "The Englishman's Library;" for, next to acquiring a perfect knowledge of the history of our mother-country, is the importance of being well acquainted with that of her colonies. The work before us is avowedly compiled from the travels of Grey, Mitchell, Sturt, Oxley, Laing, and other accredited authors; but the compiler's chief aim is to call the attention of his countrymen, both at home and in the colonies, "to the evils which have arisen from the absence of moral restraint and religious instruction in colonies of civilised and (nominally) Christian men." These evils, with the avowal that all the reverend compiler's "proceedings subject to those institutions with which it has pleased God to bless us as native land," will best characterise his modest-sized volume. Apart from the value to be attached to it as a contribution of early to Christian duty, the work before us is very attractive for its excellent sketches of the native and colonial character, the scenery of the country, &c. It is, moreover, embellished with several well-executed views, &c.

THE FRENCH MAIL.

THE FRENCH MAILS.

It is truly surprising that after the long and friendly intercourse that has subsisted between England and France, such a contrast should exist between the working of the English and the French mails. The railways on this side the Channel have nearly superseded the old mail-coaches; but when the mails were conveyed by coaches, it is impossible to forget the extraordinary exertions made throughout the remotest part of the empire to "keep time," and the surprising exactness with which the mails arrived at every town throughout their respective routes. The few that are still in existence still maintain their character for speed and punctuality.

The Duke de Nemours would do well to make himself acquainted with our system, for there is nothing in France requires so much improvement as the mode by which their mails are conveyed. It is true that they are exceedingly adroit in the administration of plenty of noise and bustle in changing horses and getting along the road. Neither the horses nor the whips are spared, but the result at the end of the journey proves that the exertions have been misapplied. There is plenty of galloping and rolling about, plenty of whipping and scolding, but we miss the care and attention to the horses, the quiet and unobtrusive labour by which the power and energies of the team are reserved for that part of the road where they can be useful, and the cool determination to be in the "right place" at the "right time." Unlike an English coachman, the drivers cannot look up at the clock at the end of their destination, and point out with pride that they are in time to a minute.

We would recommend the Duke de Nemours (whose character as a sportsman is so well established) to take back to France with him a series of the engravings called "Coaching Recollections," from the celebrated pictures of Mr. Henderson. They would afford our friends on the other side of the Channel some idea of the admirable way in which our mails and coaches were formerly conducted. They would give them some notion of "Changing," of "Starting," and of "Waking up" when time must be regained; and if they would apply these valuable hints to the malle poste between Calais and Paris, the public would materially benefit by the alteration. Not an hotel in Calais or Boulogne, from Quillac's and the Hotel du Nord down to every auberge on the road to Paris, should be without these engravings. They would teach the French aspirants to the box to form "their costume" on the "fast principle," to eschew their "pahs," and "hahs," and their "hoorooks," and doff their dirty blouse with credit. They would discover that they have never yet known how to hold the whip or the reins, or to keep their teams together; and that although a trotting waggon is good enough in its way, it cannot compare with an English mail-coach.—Times.

THE NELSON COLUMN SCAFFOLDING.

The following additional details of this ingenious improvement will be read with interest in connexion with the large engraving in our paper last week.

The scaffolding employed in constructing the Nelson column is 170 feet in height, 96 feet square at the base, and contains 150 loads of timber. This kind of scaffolding was first introduced into use by Grissell and Peto, in the erection of the Reform Club-house in Pall-mall, some three years since, and was found to possess so many advantages over the scaffolding made with poles, that it is not only used by Grissell and Peto at the new houses of Parliament, and in all their other heavy contracts where masonry is chiefly concerned, but is coming into general use by other large builders; as at the Royal Exchange, Sun Fire Office, and the new Club-house in St. James's street.

Its stability has recently been tested beyond all doubt at the Nelson column, both as to its resistance to wind at a great altitude, and in its strength and steadiness while hoisting heavy weights.

One of the advantages of this mode of scaffolding is that the timber is all convertible for the building at which it may be used; and, as the scaffolding may be dispensed with as soon as the carcase is covered in, the timber is generally used up in the internal carpentry of the building. Again, the enormous waste in scaffold-cords is also avoided, as well as the expence of a number of mason's labourers, who are always necessarily in attendance upon the scaffolding of the ordinary kind during its use.

The machine which works upon the top, and by which all materials are hoisted, is called a "Traveller," and the facility by which the mason is enabled to set his stonework is of considerable moment to the builder. A model of the scaffolding in Trafalgar-square, and of the column, has just been placed in the Museum of the National Institution at New York.

HUNGERFORD SUSPENSION BRIDGE.—It is intended to open this bridge early in May next. The abutments on either side of the Thames, and the pier on the Hungerford side, are completed. The pier on the Lambeth side is expected to be finished by Christmas. The length from pier to pier will be 600 feet, the entire length of the bridge, from the abutments on the Hungerford side to the opposite side will be 1440 feet. Its breadth in "the clear" will be about 15 feet, and its height from the water level to the footway, 28 feet.

VIEW IN NELSON DISTRICT, NEW ZEALAND.

NEW ZEALAND.

We resume our illustrations of this promising colony with the following extracts from letters received from Nelson; one of these is from a young man on the Surveying Staff, and dated Massacre Bay, April 17, 1843, in which he says—"In answer to your question about land, houses, &c., I should say that at least two-thirds of the inhabitants of Nelson have a garden; there have been quite sufficient vegetables grown this summer for the supply of the town. I cannot exactly say how many houses there are in Nelson; the labouring classes generally make mud houses, but the greater part of them make a tot-toi (grass) house, when they first land; and when they fix upon where they intend to live, they make a good mud house. The gentry have mostly built wooden houses, and some of brick. I think it would be no exaggeration to say, that there are 300 acres under cultivation in the settlement, both town and country. ——— is doing very well. I think when my time is up with the Company, that I shall join my capital to his, and farm. We catch wild pigs here they are very excellent. Pigeons are also very plentiful; we can go out, and in half an hour bring home sufficient to make a dinner for two dozen men." "Port Nelson, April 27, 1843: We have had a most delightful summer; indeed, the niceness of the weather is really monotonous; the luxuriance of the production of the soil is quite interesting. I have had a good crop (although a small one) of French beans in seven weeks, from seed. Upon the whole, the settlement is thriving, although many do not find colonising what they anticipated; in spite of climate, &c., it is something different from a mere pic-nic, especially to those who have never before been upon their own resources. I am still much gratified with my occupation, and feel no doubt about the establishment of this settlement contributing in no small degree to bettering the condition of many thousands of our fellow creatures. It is now two years since we left England; it hardly appears to me as many months, if I do not look round the country and see what has been done."

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—Nos. XLVII. & XLVIII.

THE REV. SYDNEY SMITH.

The "widely-distributed name of Smith" has often been a subject of small raillery to the small wits of the world of letters; yet many of those who have borne that cognomen have contrived to make it distinguished, thus verifying Shakspeare's remark as to the very little consequence of an appellation, either to a "rose," or a man of genius. The world is under so many obligations to the name of Smith, that its bearers have no cause to blush for it. We cannot at present enumerate all the notabilities who have sprung from this large section of the human race; but there is Adam Smith, who wrote learnedly on the "Wealth of Nations," and taught political economy to generations of statesmen, and is now more of an authority in the House of Commons than if he had a seat in it; and Horace Smith, who wrote most of the capital "Rejected Addresses," "The Lines to the Mummy," and various amusing novels, which, if the reader is not familiar with, we advise him to make himself so without loss of time; and James Smith, his brother, and literary partner; and then in another line there is Sir Sydney Smith, a commander of whom the nation may be proud, and is so; for Parliament has voted a public monument to him, whose bravery was tinged with a sort of eccentricity that marked him as a genius, and whose adventures have more of the romantic about them than those of any English commander of his day; his history containing escapes from French prisons, and fightings among Turks and Mamelukes, whom he taught at Acre not to think Napoleon quite invincible, and who, like Napier, was good both on sea and land, being by turns an admiral or a cavalry officer.

"Alike to him the sea, the shore,
The brand, the bridle, or the oar."

Of the same family, and bearing the same name, as the hero of Acre, is the subject of our sketch, the Rev. Sydney Smith, who is by profession a churchman, by nature a wit, by choice an "Edinburgh Reviewer," by circumstances made a politician, and by patronage a canon of the Cathedral of St. Paul. He is altogether a man of most singular contradictions. He is a clergyman, but his writings have less of the gravity of the divine than of the acuteness of the man of the world. He is a Whig in his politics, yet his keenest satire has been launched at Lord John Russell and Lord Melbourne. He is a dignitary of the church, and yet he has raised more laughs at the expense of the Bench of Bishops than any public writer of the day, with the exception, perhaps, of Fonblanque. This is explained, in some measure, by his being a member of one of those cathedral establishments, whose emoluments were wrenched upon by the Ecclesiastical Commission, and the arrangements consequent on its formation. There was always something very earnest in his explosions of wrath at that commission, the creation of which, it may be remarked, was a Whig measure, asserted to by the Bishop of London; hence his enmity to those who were its authors and abettors, though on other points he agreed with them.

PORTRAIT OF THE REV. SYDNEY SMITH.

As a writer, the Rev. Sydney Smith is best known by his "Peter Plymley's Letters," published during the agitation of the Catholic question. They had an immense circulation at the time, and produced a great effect. They were intended to show that the fears of the opponents of emancipation were unfounded; and this he effected by turning their arguments into subjects of ridicule. He is a great master of this weapon, and many passages of the most acuteand happy satire might be quoted from these letters. His other works are scattered through a long series of "Edinburgh Reviews," to which he was one of the earliest contributors. They have recently been collected and published in a separate form. This is a convenience to the reader, but we question its advantage to the reputation of the writer. The periodical essayist inevitably repeats himself, but when his productions are separated from each other by months and volumes, those repetitions escape notice; not sowhen brought together. The brilliancy that strikes and charms on its occasional occurrence, is apt to dazzle us, and in some degree to fatigue us when read en masse. The reverend and witty canon is, moreover, a decided mannerist—that is, he treats all subjects alike: nothing is so serious or shocking, but he looks at its ridiculous side, and uses it as a peg on which to hang as many good or moral things as possible. There is no kind of reading so wearying as a collection of jests, and the writings of the Rev. Sydney Smith do tend to produce that peculiar sort of "vexation of spirit." The continual pouring forth of witticisms on every topic, some of them suggestive of far different emotions, also subjects him to a suspicion of heartlessness, which perhaps does wrong to his character, for we have heard that he is of a generous and kindly nature. Some of his chapters on colonization are liable to this charge. The merriment he created in Parliament and out of it on the question of the locking the doors of the carriages on the railroads, at the time of the dreadful catastrophe on the Versailles line, must be fresh in every body's recollection. We fully subscribe to the maxim of Horace, that truth may be conveyed in a joke; but the laugh that is raised at the expence of better feelings is not a hearty or a wholesome one. With the exception of this blemish, the works of the Rev. Sydney Smith contain much to recommend them. He seems to have started with a determination of being a living contradiction to the sarcasm of Pope, where he asserts that,

"Dulness is sacred in a sound divine."

His writings have gained him fame, but it may be questioned whether they have not injured his prospects. Notwithstanding all his services to the party, the Whigs would never make him a bishop. Like Swift, he seems to have written himself out of the road of church preferment. He is now an old man, and the Conservatives, whom he has all his life opposed, are not likely to advance the partisan whom his friends neglected. His last productions are three letters to the Americans on their repudiation of their public debts. He has lost considerably by investing his property in American funds, and his letters the last of them published but three days since—contain some bitter and biting truths; yet they are as amusing and witty (to those not circumstanced like the writer of them) as any of his former efforts. If the principle that those may laugh who win, holds good across the Atlantic, none will enjoy them more than the Americans. The rev canon is said to be as admirable a companion and conversationalist, as he is a writer; is amiable and cheerful in the midst of old age and pecuniary losses, either of which break the spirit and health of thousands of ordinary men. Long may he live to enjoy his reputation, for when he passes away, he will leave no successor. The present member for Northampton, the late Under Secretary of the Colonies of the Russell and Melbourne ministry, the Right Hon. Vernon Smith, is the nephew of the rev. gentleman. The connection of his family with the late Government did not at all blunt the shafts of satire that he occasionally discharged at the heads of it.

Our portrait of the witty canon has been copied, by permission of the publishers, from the second edition of the "Collected Works." The third letter on American Debt, already referred to, will be found in another column of the present journal.

MR. WARBURTON, M.P.

The tide of politics seems, at present, to be drifting into the House of Commons some of those whom its "retiring ebb," during the general election of 1841, left stranded on the shoals of "minority." Thus, the contest for London has enabled the portly Mr. Pattison to take his old station among the collective wisdom; and now the struggle for the representation of Kendal has produced the same result for Mr. Warburton, a man whose exertions have won him a prominent place among the political celebrities of the day.

Mr. Warburton, during his past parliamentary career, was connected by position with the borough of Bridport—by principles with the Liberals, but rather with the Radicals than the Whigs—and by speech, and notes, and advocacy, with several measures which men of all parties, indeed the community at large, have decided are measures of great social improvement, of some of which he was the author, and of others one of the ablest supporters. He was thrown out of his seat for Bridport by a "petition," an instrument which has been very efficacious in unseating members on both sides, where the opponents and their agents were the reverse of scrupulous, particularly where the individual had not a fortune that he could spend without missing, among the lawyers. The defence of a seat disputed by a petition, before a committee, at an average expense of two hundred pounds sterling a day, or thereabouts, is, the reader may believe, by no means a joke, and when subjected to it, it sometimes becomes a question whether the honour of being an M.P. may not be too dearly purchased. Some considerations of this kind, had, if we remember, their influence in causing Mr. Warburton's retirement from the House of Commons. As talents are respected even by those who dislike the mode in which they are applied, it is not without a certain kind of satisfaction that the opponents of the honourable gentleman will see him resume his station, though he is returned partly by the influence of that powerful body, the Anti-Corn Law League, which seems acquiring strength daily, and which has this week astonished the public with a list of subscriptions to the "Fund," totally unexampled in the history of agitation. There can be no doubt that it exercised great influence, both in London and Kendal. As a proof of this, and at the same time as a personal tribute to Mr. Warburton, we give a passage from one of the ablest of our weekly contemporaries, and which may be taken as good evidence, the writer having Conservative and Ministerial tendencies

"The second election that has occurred since the Anti-corn Law League began its new career is the second also in its list of success; and this time it has been instrumental in restoring to the House of Commons one of its most accomplished members, the influence of whose knowledge and business-like energy is constantly exemplified to us in the abolition of a disgraceful nuisance that infested our churchyards, with the benefit he has since effected by his Anatomy Bill, and in the daily use of the Penny Postage, which he carried against both Whig and Tory leaders." The reference to the last named measure must, we think, be a little qualified as to the share of merit due to Mr. Warburton for its final success. There was a strong opinion out of doors in favour of it, which he did not wholly create. But with regard to the others mentioned, the whole reward of praise was due to him. True there was always a feeling of horror at every repetition of those once frequent desecrations of the resting-place of the dead, which formed the trade of a set of the most hardened and degraded wretches that ever disgraced humanity; but it is astonishing how long an evil of this nature will be complained of and tolerated, as if a remedy were impossible, unless some one mind takes up the question, and directs the great mass of opinion into a channel that leads to a practical mode of pulling it down. Mr. Warburton did this for society, by providing legally for the demands of medical science. That demand had created and continued a crime worse than the worst committed in the savage state of existence, and possibly only in a state of high civilization, of which it was the stain and reproach To violate the sepulchre, and to rifle the tomb, for the sake of selling the sad relics of humanity—one would think that this was a horror of so deep a hue, that the imagination could not go beyond it. Yet there was something far worse than even this. The human life was at last sacrificed, that the human clay might be made available for the gain of there; the soul was dispossessed of its dwelling, for the sake of its perishable mansion; the "immortal jewel" was cast out, that the worthless casket might be sold for money! There are some things which, while we contemplate, we shudder at ourselves, and crimes, over which it is best to draw the veil of oblivion. To all who assisted in putting an end to so monstrous an evil, the gratitude of all men is due; and chiefly to the exertions of Mr. Warburton do we owe it, that we hear of such horrors no longer. He always paid much attention to what may be called medical legislation; and we hope that he will now promote the measures, so loudly called for, for promoting the health of towns; of which one at least is the state of the churchyards in our "million-peopled city." To take up this subject in Parliament, we know no one so well qualified as the honourable member for Kendal.

The present Parliament will be the seventh in which he has had a seat. He is connected with the commercial interests of the country, having formerly been an eminent Baltic merchant; but we believe he has long retired from the cares of business. He is connected by marriage with Sir Howard Elphinstone, Bart., who married the honourable gentleman's sister. At the election for Kendal, he was opposed by a member of the powerful family of the Beninckes, over whom, however, he secured a majority of 63.

BROMLEY CHURCH.

RESTORATION OF BROMLEY CHURCH.

In our paper of last week, we illustrated one of the early productions of the architect to the New Houses of Parliament, and we now feel equal satisfaction in bringing under notice the work of one of the successful competitors on that occasion.

The restoration, on an enlarged scale, of the parish church of "Bromley-atte-Bowe," in Kent, has just been effected, under the professional guidance of Mr. Railton, who has followed, as closely as practicable, the style of the original Norman fabric. The building, indeed, which has just been almost wholly demolished, formed, in all probability, the eastern portion only of a larger edifice, as we may naturally suppose the church of the convent at Bromley to have been; and the ancient arch, mentioned by antiquarians, was, without doubt, the opening into the chancel from a nave, of which every trace has been long since removed.

The exterior of the new work is of brick; and, although the architectural propriety and some elegance of detail have not been omitted, the chief aim appears to have been to produce a consistent characteristic and picturesque effect. So completely do the simple forms and quiet mellow tones harmonize and blend with the woody avenues, the grey colouring of age, and pensive stillness of the place, that we think the result cleverly conveyed by our artist. But, led by the inviting chime, let us seek an entrance, and passing through the tower, notice the venerable slab that has evidently been richly charged with monumental brasses; and, passing into the body of the church, we perceive that the arch before mentioned, has been reinstated, and forms a handsome frontispiece to the organ gallery.

There is an aisle on the south side only, opening to the nave by a series of four semi-circular arches, supported by piers, of which the faces are broken into shafts, and the capitals form clusters of richly-carved foliage.

The north side has lofty windows, and the spaces between them have been devoted to the display of some finely-sculptured mural monuments.

A porch, with zig-zag and other ornaments, forms a pleasing feature in this wall.

Looking to the east, we are attracted by a richly-carved communion-rail, executed in oak, and of a most appropriate and elegant design. This railing is raised three steps from the floor of the church, and, forms the enclosure of the chancel, the arch of which is of lofty proportion, and has delicately enriched and spirately moulded shafts, with foliated capitals supporting the beak-head, and other effective enrichments. The chancel terminates in a semi-circular apsis, with an arched gallery, running round at the level of the windows, and crowned by a ribbed vaulted ceiling.

The extreme attention to style observable throughout this church shows it to have been most carefully studied, and we have no doubt it will attract the attention of every visitor of architectural taste.

One improved feature in the arrangement of this church is the total absence of pews, so that a perfect uniformity is preserved between the appropriated and the free seats.

The works were contracted for by Messrs. Robert and George Webb; and, with the exception of the chancel, for which funds were furnished by the munificence of a highly-respected parishioner, the restoration has been carried out with the most scrupulous attention to economy.

The Cincinnati Gazette states that the stock of hogs is fully an average one throughout the region dependent upon Cincinnati for a market, especially in Kentucky, and the preparations for both packing and slaughtering are more extensive this year than we have ever noticed

THE "DOVE," MISSIONARY SCHOONER.

THE MISSIONARY STEAM SCHOONER DOVE.

This fine screw schooner has just been built by Mr. John Laird, of Birkenhead, for the Baptist Missionary Society for the Civilization of Africa.—She was launched at Mr. Laird's works a few days since, the lady of the Rev. Mr. Lancaster naming her. The principal dimensions are:—

Length between perpendiculars	75 feet
Beam amidships	15 "
Depth of hold	7	9 in.
Tonnage—old measurement	tons 73

with a pair of oscillating engines of 10 horse power each, manufactured by Messrs. George Forrester and Co., of Liverpool; the screw fitted (on Mr. Smith's patent principle), in the "Dead Iron."

She is meddled to steam or sail, her lines being well hollowed forward and aft, with sufficient bearings to float her, with all fitments and stores, on 6 feet water; and it is considered by nautical authorities that a better model for the purposes for which she is intended, could not have been designed. Her commander is Captain W. Walters.

Her rendezvous will be Fernando Po, whence she will proceed to different parts of the Western Coast with Missionaries, whose laudable endeavours—with the blessing of God—to establish Christianity amongst the benighted people of Africa, will, let us hope, be ultimately successful.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE CENSUS.—We have to thank numerous subscribers and correspondents for their favour able opinion of our Census Supplement, and, at the same time, to assure them that we shall spare no expense to bring forward, from time to time, such useful information as will gratify our readers, and insure the same favourable reception from the public. We shall continue to print new editions, and copies may be ordered of all booksellers and newsvenders in the United Kingdom, or by order direct to our publisher. Correspondents should bear in mind that being stamped as a supplement to our paper, it may be forwarded by post TO ALL PARTS OF THE WORLD FREE OF POSTAGE. We are confident that no work has ever been produced of such extent and colour at the price, and we are gratified to be able to state that the Government and public departments have expressed their favourable opinion of our arduous undertaking, and their astonishment at the details of a Parliamentary document, exceeding 600 pages, could have been compressed into the limits of sixteen, and in such a convenient form for reference.

With the title-page and index to our third volume we shall publish all additions and corrections in the Census, and we recommend our subscribers to bind it with the volume, being highly useful for reference. Copies may still be had of all newsmen and booksellers, or, by order, enclosing stamps, to our publisher, W. Little, 198, Strand.

CENSUS ERRATA.—The following places were omitted in their proper place:—
A glebare (town), Devon, pop. 3171; Beaurton, Wilts, pop. 108; Dereham, East, Norfolk, pop. 3334; St. Erney, Cornwall, pop. 81; Ingleton, West York, pop. 1385; Marston Moretaine, Bucks, pop. 1147; Rottingdean, Sussex, pop. 693; Walworth, Devon, pop. 267.

"F. R. S. L." will find the population of the parish of Bromley, county of Kent, in our list. The Government return does not state the population of the village of Bromley, nor is there any other work which gives it. We may here state, for the information of correspondents generally, that the official returns does not give the population of villages, being included with the total for the parishes in which they are respectively situa-

"A Subscriber."—The population of the parish of Thornton-in-Lonsdale is correctly given, according to the official return. It comprises the townships of Ireby, in Lancashire, Burton-in-Lonsdale, and Thornton-in-Lonsdale, in West York; the whole containing 1138 inhabitants.

"R. A." Bolton.—Thanks for his communication. The population of the parish of Littleham, in the county of Devon, is correctly given in our list—3927 inhabitants, of which number 3654 are in that part of the town of Exmouth which is in that parish; the remainder of Exmouth town is in the parish of Withycombe-Raleigh. The entire town contains 4356 inhabitants.

"W. E., Jun."—The tithing of Quabbington, in the county of Wilts, contains 333 inhabitants. The population is included with the parish of Fuggleston, in which it is situate.

DUBLIN STATE TRIALS.—CONTINUATION OF THE ILLUSTRATIONS.—Next week we shall resume our engravings, with magnificent views, portraits of the Lord Lieutenant and Chief Secretary, the Attorney and Solicitor General, and other Crown Lawyers engaged in the pending State Prosecutions. Also, striking views of the Pneumatic Railway, to be opened next week.

THE FASHIONS are purposely omitted this week, as it is our intention to insert this illustration in future but once a month, at the suggestion of several fair readers. The engraving will be of larger size, and altogether of better execution.

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

A new and beautiful attraction, in the spirit of liberal art-encouragement, which it has been one of the objects of this newspaper lavishly to promote—a work which it is hoped will be found to exceed in novelty and beauty the magnificent tableaux of London already presented to the subscribers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS—is in active preparation for our readers, and will shortly be definitely announced.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1843.

Mr. Sydney Smith—the reverend canon, whose letters proclaim him to be such a great gun in the firing off of "shot epistolary," has levelled another broadside against the insolvent States of America, to which he lent his money while they took all the benefit of the Act! There is something beautifully racy about the writing of the reverend divine;—it is ever more profane than sacred, but it has a spice and flavour in it that make one taste and enjoy it, even though it be written in the cause of mammon, and for the recovery not of sin into the paths of virtue but of gold into the pocket of Smith. In his peculiar case we may derive amusement "even from the canon's mouth"—and, although another human being seems involved in the sacrifice, we do not feel the charitable regret which we ought to feel, that Gen. Duffy Green should, so far as his letter-writing is concerned, be "done so excessively brown." When we have not that which we like, says the French dramatic philosopher, we must endeavour to like that which we have; and so Sydney Smith, who has not the money he would like back from bankrupt America, endeavours to like the sport which the occasion of his own loss gives him of thrashing handsomely, not only the people who have robbed, but the general who seeks to identify their nationality with his own! Smith discovers that verdure about Green which Green himself did not dream of. Smith sees that there is something green about Green, or he would never have written that letter. Green, on the other hand—Duffy Green—wishes that he had held his tongue that he had remained "L'homme verd et tranquil"—the Green Man and Still! He considers

> That most powerful parson, Peter Pith,
> The loudest wit he e'er was deniened with.

And he is right. Whenever Sydney Smith does write he does make a noise. When he does write, however, he does not right always. Par exemple, we do not think it quite right in a clergyman to take so much interest in the matter of debt and credit as between nations and individuals. We do not say that he ought to confine himself to the stocks of his own parish, but we do think it would be just as well if he did not, in the character of a mere speculator, dabble in any other stocks whatever. Nor do we like to see, in a servant of the Lord, too poignant regrets for that "Mammon," who cannot be served with "God." We would rather, therefore, that the bright letter we have alluded to, as well as its sparkling predecessor, should have come from a "lay proprietor," instead of a clerical speculator in Pennsylvanian promises. Yet, we repeat, that we enjoy the letters themselves, and we guess they annoy the Americans as much as they annihilate the Duffy Greens. The Rev. Sydney is a satire upon their national flag—he is a star administering the stripes. His theme is the dry one of money, but his justice is castigatorially poetical. How he marches off his army of Yankees to the prison of his imagination—his "insolvent infantry!"—the "bankrupt heavy horse!"—the "vivre sans payer," as the war-cry, and the are aliens on the trumpets! He cuts down the whole people with his trenchant blade—literally stunts them until, like their own native dwarf "so short that they hav'nt paid their debts these ten years." There is no hope for them—he gives them up in despair—he is going to invest his money in the "Turkish fours!"

Now, bandage apart, nothing can be more deserved than the English gentleman's censure upon American dishonesty—upon that infamous system of national swindling which has ruined so many deluded speculators here—and which, in the United States, roused the shame and indignation of Mr. Webster into that loud and powerful exhortation to his countrymen to be honest, which so lately fixed the admiration of the English press. The fine burst of manly declamation, however, in which Mr. Webster propounds his noble principles was, we fear, lost upon the hardened insolvency of the Pennsylvanian cheats. They will not pay! No, they will leave paying a loan, as poor Theodore Hook said of them when they borrowed. But it cannot be denied that the habitual dishonesty of the bankrupt states is nationally disgraceful—that it involves a slur upon the whole American people—that it will destroy their character at home, and their credit abroad, at least them for ever open to such caustic, bitter, and well-merited punishment, as Mr. Smith has bestowed upon them with his epistolary rod. It is bad enough to find the vicious recklessness of wilful insolvency contaminating society by the example of individuals: but when it grows up among nations, and spreads its brazen villany over the face of a whole country, it can only be contemplated with scorn, loathing, and disgust. And if it ruins the character of a nation in peace so would it ruin its resources in war: and even General Duffy Green himself would find it difficult to lead his unpaying troops to victory when they discovered that, in addition to being unpaying, they were also unpaid! Not so, however, think the Federal Government of the States. No—they are about to issue five millions of paper dollars—and most dolorous paper it will prove to anybody that takes it. We hope the march of that paper may be properly confined; but we cannot too much admire the impudence which proposes its circulation. In the mean while Rothschild and Baring have shut their purses, and America, as a nation cannot even borrow of a private bank. She can issue her paper dollars among her own people—but their worthlessness will be a proverb in every other quarter of the globe—and the most speculative foreigner would not venture sixpence upon a bundle of them unless he were hard-up for materials wherewith to light his cigar.

The Committee appointed by the Government to inquire into the working of the present system of postage, arrived at the conclusion of their labours some time ago; but their report has only just now been published. We must say, that a more meagre document, in the shape of an official report, was never made public. About fifty lines in the columns of a newspaper include all the Committee have found time to say, and that consists merely of a bold statement of the fact that they have made the inquiry directed, and that they "regret" they have no time to give an opinion on the evidence adduced, involving, as it does, so many minute details. This very brief report is, however, accompanied by more than three hundred pages of evidence, so that those of the public, who may have access to it, may form their own opinions upon it in default of any authoritative opinion from the Committee. The witnesses examined were mostly persons belonging to the Post-office, and from their statements may be gathered a great mass of information as to the management of this immense and important establishment, though the reader may, perhaps, experience some trouble in so arranging it as to arrive at a clear and distinct notion of the system on which it is conducted. The evidence that will attract most attention is that of Mr. Rowland Hill, to whose plan of postage the public at large is so much indebted for a daily and almost hourly convenience. He is a sincere and energetic man, with an intimate knowledge of the question he takes in hand, and we should be sorry to see his views quite overruled by the decisions of those who are necessarily, in some degree, circumscribed in their ideas by the routine of office. Mr. Hill declares that, with a "revived trade," the Post-office revenue, at the penny rate, will eventually rise to £1,300,000, but that, hitherto, the plan has been tried under very unfavourable circumstances, as respects the general prosperity of the country. There can be no doubt that in this respect, Mr. Hill states no more than the fact. Lord Lowther, on the other hand, sees no prospect of any increase in the amount of the revenue from this department, the populous districts being now well supplied with letters, and no great increase being to be expected from those parts of the country which are thinly inhabited, with this contingency to be also kept in mind, that, should any great increase in the number of letters take place, an increase of expense must also be incurred by the establishment, the persons employed being pretty hard pressed already. So diametrically opposed are the innovator and the man of office. The following short passage from the evidence of Colonel Maberly is rather curious:—

I suppose you consider the postage rate now reduced to the minimum?—So long as you can go still further, I suppose it is not reduced to the minimum. I cannot answer that question.

The great probability is that it will not be reduced lower?—I do not know; we may have a second Mr. Hill, perhaps.

Do you think it probable or not that there will be any further reduction?—I do not know whether I think it probable, I think it is not

We also think it is not; we do not believe there is any wish on the part of the public to see the rate of postage reduced so low as to make the Post-office a drain on other sources of revenue: there is no question that it may be made quite capable of supporting itself. The objection to the old system was, that it made a revenue out of a business of daily life, only one degree less injurious to some of the best interests of society than a tax on conversation itself. Some of the greatest difficulties in the way of any improvement in the present system in the unwillingness of the Treasury to try expensive experiments. And yet there are some improvements that are not only saleable, but absolutely indispensable. The following is Colonel Maberly's testimony as to the extent to which the robbery of letters containing money and valuable articles is carried on in the Post-office; from any other source, it would have been scarcely credible:—

How have you ascertained that there has been this amount of plunder from time to time?—Lord Lowther has stated to me that the greater part of his patronage since he first came to the Post-office arose from dismissals. Since I did the business connected with losses comes before me; it is rather a police business, which is managed by one of the clerks in the department of my office called the "Missing Letter Branch," the solicitor, and myself, inasmuch as it is necessary to keep all these communications thoroughly confidential and away from other persons, and I can state that the plunder is terrific

Some system of registering letters, or other security to the public must be introduced, or confidence will be lost in what, with many faults, is a stupendous and magnificent establishment.

REPUDIATION OF THE AMERICANS BY THE REV. SYDNEY SMITH

The Reverend and witty Sydney Smith, whose portrait we rejoice to be enabled in our present publication to present to our readers, had something more than a fortnight since published an amusing and sarcastic philippic against "the drab coloured gentlemen of the State of Pennsylvania," who delight in repudiation of their pecuniary obligations. The length of the letter precluded its insertion on our columns. A General Duff Green—or Quixotic Times has well observed that his impudence is a talent—sent some letters to that journal in defence of his country men. They have drawn from the reverend gentleman the following characteristic reply:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING CHRONICLE.

SIR,—Having been unwell for some days past, I have had no opportunity of paying my respects to General Duff Green, who, (whatever he his other merits) has certainly not shown himself a Washington in defence of his country. The General demands, with a beautiful simplicity, "Whence this morbid hatred of America? But this question, as affecting me in it, is stolen from Pilpay's fables: "A fox," says Pilpay in a certain apologue, "came to the farm yard: uttered the most piercing cries of distress; forthwith all the birds of the yard gathered round him, and seemed to delight in his misfortune; hens chuckled, geese hissed, ducks quacked, and peacocks screamed with stupid exultation." Whence, said the fox, stepping forward with a mute gravity, whence this morbid hatred of the fox? What have I done? Whom have I injured? I am overwhelmed with astonishment at these unjust outcries. Some old wives' tale, I suppose, about the poultry exclusive, where are our ducklings? where are our goslings? Did not I see you running away yesterday with my mother in your mouth? did not you eat up all my relations last week? You cannot be ignorant of cause—to be peaceful is the grand precess." Now hence, General Green, comes the morbid hatred of America, as you term it. Because her conduct has been predatory—because she has ruined my helpless children, many miserable women, so many aged men—because she has disturbed the order of the world, and rifled those sacred treasures which human virtue had hoarded for human misery. Why is such a downfall? Why is it not just, Washington would say? Why, is it not disgraceful to want it? Why, is it not honourable to feel it?

Hate America!!! I have loved and honoured America all my life; and in the "Edinburgh Review," and on all opportunities when my trumpery sphere of action has afforded, I have never ceased to praise and defend the United States; and to every American to whom I have had the good fortune to be introduced, I have proffered all the hospitality in my power. But I cannot shut my eyes to enormous dishonesty; nor, remembering their former state, can I restrain myself from calling on them (though I copy Satan) to spring up from the gulf of infamy into which they are rolling.

"Awake, arise, or be for ever fallen."

I am astonished that the honest States of America do not draw a Cordon Sanitaire round their unpaying brethren, that the truly mercant New Yorkers, and the truly honest people of Boston, may not be compelled in self-defence to visit wear an uniform with "S. S., or Swindle States," worked in gold letters upon the coat, and receipts in full of all demands tumbured on the waistcoats, and "for own property" figured on their pantaloons.

But the General seems shocked that I should say the Americans cannot go to war without money; but what do I mean by war? Not irruptions into Canada nor the conquering of millions in Europe, but a long tedious maritime war of four or five years duration. To say man so foolish as to suppose that Rothschild has nothing to do with such wars as these? and that a bankrupt State, without the means of paying a shilling in the world, can not be compelled in such a contest? We all know that the Americans can fight. Nobody does a their courage. I see now, in my mind's eye, a whole army on the plains of Pennsylvania in battle array—heavy corps of unshrived light infantry, remnants of heavy horse debtors, battalions of repudiators, brigades of bankrupts, with Vivre sans payer, on their banners, and are aliens on their trumpets: all these despite-deserving would fight to the death for their country, and probably die ere they saw their invading creditors. Of their courage, I repeat again, I have no doubt. I wish I had the same confidence in their wisdom. But I believe they will become convinced by the flattery of unprincipled orators; and instead of entering with us into a noble competition in making an ice (the great object for which the Anglo Saxon race appears to have been created), they will waste their lin, pieces and their money (if they can get any) in years of silly, bloody, foolish, and perverse war, to prove to the world that Pericles is a real fine gentleman, as it suit the principles of the Washington steamer will carry farther than those of the Britannia Victoria, or the Robert Peel vessel of war.

I am accused of applying the epithet repudiation to states which have not re-

Do you think it probable or not that there will be any further reduction?—I do not know whether I think it probable, I think it is not

We also think it is not; we do not believe there is any wish on the part of the public to see the rate of postage reduced so low as to make the Post-office a drain on other sources of revenue: there is no question that it may be made quite capable of supporting itself. The objection to the old system was, that it made a revenue out of a business of daily life, only one degree less injurious to some of the best interests of society than a tax on conversation itself. Some of the greatest difficulties in the way of any improvement in the present system in the unwillingness of the Treasury to try expensive experiments. And yet there are some improvements that are not only saleable, but absolutely indispensable. The following is Colonel Maberly's testimony as to the extent to which the robbery of letters containing money and valuable articles is carried on in the Post-office; from any other source, it would have been scarcely credible:—

How have you ascertained that there has been this amount of plunder from time to time?—Lord Lowther has stated to me that the greater part of his patronage since he first came to the Post-office arose from dismissals. Since I did the business connected with losses comes before me; it is rather a police business, which is managed by one of the clerks in the department of my office called the "Missing Letter Branch," the solicitor, and myself, inasmuch as it is necessary to keep all these communications thoroughly confidential and away from other persons, and I can state that the plunder is terrific

Some system of registering letters, or other security to the public must be introduced, or confidence will be lost in what, with many faults, is a stupendous and magnificent establishment.

pudiated. Perhaps so; but then these latter states have not paid. But what is the difference between a man who says, "I don't owe you anything, and will not pay you," and another who says, "I do owe you a sum, and will not pay, and will not pay, and will not pay have portraits of the counsel and attorneys on both sides. Some of these are extraordinary men, and all worthy of notice.

THE JUDGES.

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE PENNEFATHER.

His lordship was one of the most distinguished men at the bar, and whether as a lawyer or an advocate, he had very few competitors. Without wishing the remark to apply to the eminent person who presides over the Irish Queen's Bench, it may be observed that the question has from time to time been mooted whether the best lawyers make always the best judges, and it has often been remarked that a mediocrity of talent and legal acquirements, accompanied by patience, equanimity, and a good constitution, has enabled, in many instances, its possessors to rank amongst the most useful members of the judicial bench in this, as well as the sister country. His lordship for many years previous to his elevation enjoyed but very indifferent health, and, like Sir William Follett, afforded one of those rare exceptions to the general rule, that "if a lawyer leaves his business, his business will leave him." His lordship, like the English Solicitor-General, has been often obliged, from ill health, to absent himself for months together from his profession, and to leave his clients in other hands; and yet his return was scarcely announced when his business was as great, his bag as full of briefs as ever, and his reappearance was now and then so marked by increased power and renovated energies, that by all who hailed his return it might have been said of him—

Scarce out of sight,
He burst more brilliantly to light.

His lordship's political opinions, whenever he felt called on to express any, were Conservative. Such expression, however, was by no means of frequent occurrence, and was never remarkable for that personal harshness and indiscreet violence, the faults, in too many instances, of our Irish politicians on both sides of the Boyne. When the present administration came into power, his lordship was offered the Irish Seals, Sir Edward Sugden having, it is said, refused them. When, however, the latter had re-considered his opinion, and agreed to accept them, the then Mr. Pennefather was offered the office of Solicitor-General, which he agreed to take, under the present Master of the Rolls, who was then Attorney-General, and this arrangement was entered into with the distinct promise of the Chief Justiceship of the Queen's Bench when the vacancy should occur, which was then shortly expected. Although attached to his native country, as all Irishmen are, it would appear that the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland entertains a more substantial predilection for England. Most, if not all his purchases of property, of late years—so I have been credibly informed—have been made in that country. This fact, under ordinary circumstances, might be deemed of trifling import; but in strange times like the present it is not without a meaning.

His lordship's brother, one of the Barons of the Exchequer, is one of the best judges on the bench in either country; and for one family to boast of two brothers achieving such eminence in the one profession, may be looked on as a matter of very rare occurrence.

The Right Honourable Edward Pennefather, Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, was called to the bar in 1796; and his brother, the Honourable Richard Pennefather, second Baron of the Exchequer, was called in 1795. Chief Justice Pennefather is about in his seventieth year.

JUDGE BURTON. CHIEF JUSTICE PENNEFATHER. JUDGE CRAMPTON. JUDGE PERRIN.

THE FOUR JUDGES.

JUDGE BURTON.

The Honourable Charles Burton, second Justice of the Queen's Bench, is not an Irishman; and for the introduction of this great favourite of her bar, and distinguished ornament of her bench, Ireland is indebted to her illustrious son, the late John Philpot Curran. He it was who, seeing the young Englishman's excellent aptitude and steady application to legal business, first induced him to think of Ireland as the field of his future exertions, and the Irish bar as his future profession. Judge Burton was called in the year 1792, and was, almost from the very outset of his professional career, looked upon as a first-rate lawyer. He soon broke many a spear with some of the first and oldest legal champions, and had many a successful encounter with them in the lists of fame. For one of these, a giant in his way, the celebrated Sergeant (John) Bull, he was almost alone considered an equal, or as having a chance of success in an equity contest. Judge Burton's politics, as may be easily imagined from the auspices under which he entered public life, were Whig. During Mr. Curran's life he was intimately connected with the political party of his patron; but after his death he devoted himself almost exclusively to the duties of his profession. Whether his political opinions in later years, and especially since his elevation to the bench, have preserved a perfectly consistent complexion, is a question which I should not take upon myself to solve; but one thing is certain—that the Conservative party do not claim him as their own, although it is pretty certain that he afforded his son-in-law, the late eminent barrister, Mr. West, the most liberal pecuniary support in his various contests for the representation of the city of Dublin. If it be considered a fault to have been solicitous to add in such cases an unit to the strength of that party to which he had been opposed through life, it may, after all, be looked upon in a very venial light, when filial claims are recollected, and the strong natural love of a parent's breast is placed in conflict with principles of speculative consideration. And well might such a father, himself, in his public and private life, a most estimable and amiable man, entertain the deepest solicitude, and make the largest sacrifice, for such a son, beloved and respected as he, too, was by men of all parties—but alone those who were honoured with his friendship, but those who had the happiness of enjoying even his professional acquaintance.

JUDGE CRAMPTON

The Hon. Philip Cecil Crampton, third Justice of the Queen's Bench, was called to the bar in the year 1810. His brilliant academic career at the Irish University afforded sure presage of his successful progress in the path of life which he selected for his future professional exertions. The honours which he won at his degree examination were followed by that one of most difficult attainment, and therefore most distinguished, a Fellowship of Trinity, and he was subsequently appointed Law Professor to the College. There is nothing remarkable in his political life or character. He sat on the Liberal side of the House of Commons for Dungarvan, and was a Whig Solicitor General. Although his political opinions were always of a mild and moderate description, yet he stuck firmly by his party, and his party did not forget him. O'Connell never liked him, and he never liked O'Connell, so it is supposed according to the spirit of political appointments, and the conflicting interests which governments have to consider amongst even their own supporters, that he was provided for, and "benched" out of the way as soon as possible. Judge Crampton was, when at the bar, taken great notice of by the Lord Chief Justice, and was looked upon by the profession as his lordship's pet, which may perhaps account for the fact that he has sat so frequently at Nisi Prius, and has had more business in that line than any other Irish puisne judge. Judge Crampton is a most accomplished man, and from his large mental acquirements may, although never having claimed the palm of eloquence, be deemed in all other respects as master of the requisites to make an orator of the true stamp according to the opinion of the Roman critic—"Omnibus artibus et disciplinis instructus atque ornatus." Judge Crampton has given through life many proofs of high moral and religious feeling, and amongst many instances of his character in this respect, it may be mentioned that the great cause of temperance, which has done so much to ameliorate the social condition of the Irish millions, can claim his lordship amongst its first and most consistent champions. Judge Crampton was a water drinker for a considerable time before Father Mathew's humane mission was ever thought of; and a singular anecdote is told of the determination which he at first evinced to give the strongest proof in his power of his utter hostility till the end of his life against everything like intemperance. He ordered the contents of a very valuable wine cellar to be emptied into the stream which flows through his villa near Bray, in the county Wicklow. Judge Crampton is about sixty years of age.

JUDGE PERRIN.

The Right Honourable Louis Perrin, fourth judge of the Queen's Bench, is the descendant of a Huguenot family. His father was distinguished for scholastic attainments, and published a celebrated French pronouncing dictionary. In early life the distinguished object of our sketch was remarkable for untiring application to business, by which he soon acquired a thorough knowledge of revenue and crown law. He always stood high as an advocate at Nisi Prius, and as a sound constitutional lawyer was equally respectable. His perfect habits of business and solidity of judgment, as well as his character for straightforward sterling honesty in public and private life, induced those of the citizens of Dublin who belonged to the party to which his lordship has ever been attached, to fix their eyes upon him at the memorable general election of 1831, which carried the Reform Bill, as a fit person in every respect to represent their opinions in the Commons' House of Parliament. The corporation of Dublin, from time immemorial, had commanded the return of the city members. So overpowering, however, was the force which the civic body had to contend with on this occasion Lord Anglesey's Government, without any disguise, threw its weight into the conflict—that it suffered a severe, but, after all, a temporary defeat, for Perrin and Harty (Sir Robert, then Lord Mayor of Dublin) were unseated on petition. Mr. Perrin was subsequently invited by a large body of the electors of Monaghan to sit for that county at the next general election; and his return was achieved after a very severe and well-sustained contest by both parties. He then became Solicitor-General to the Whigs, the late much-lamented Sir Michael O'Loghlen, afterwards appointed to the Mastership of the Rolls, being Attorney-General. His parliamentary career was of short duration, but particularly remarkable for constant personal attendance, and sedulous attention to the watching and revision of Irish bills. His opinion was highly respected, and his advice was very much sought for by the Government of the day. Judge Perrin was called to the bar in the year 1806, and has passed his sixtieth year.

priority to their reverences is equally acknowledged when with laymen they are seized upon by Fortune, to prove that they too are not beyond her power, and are candidates for the voice of Fame.

MR. O'CONNELL.

Who wants to know who he is? A thousand biographies have been written of him; and "Si historiam quæris circumspice!"

Mr. O'Connell is charged with uttering seditious speeches on occasions amounting to about fifty—the indictment and bill of particulars setting forth in all instances the times and places, and in many instances the speeches—with collecting large meetings for purposes of intimidation; with uttering speeches intended and calculated to corrupt the army and navy; with issuing certain documents, signed by him as chairman of the Repeal Committee, having a similar tendency; and with endeavouring to bring her Majesty's constituted Courts of Law into disrespect by forming other tribunals.

THE REV. MR. TYRRELL.

To all outward appearance this reverend gentleman would be deemed by a general observer of physiognomy, a quiet and amiable man. I am given to understand that whatever may be thought of his political opinions by those who are opposed to him, and no one can deny that he has expressed himself most strongly, there is but one opinion as to his private, as well as his professional character, which is very much esteemed by his parishioners. I believe I am correct in stating, that in former years, like many of his reverend brethren of the Catholic priesthood, he engaged in the anti-tithe warfare, which for a long time agitated Ireland previously to the passing of Lord Stanley's bill, which changed that impost into a rent-charge. From that period until very recently, although the rev. gentleman also entertained Repeal opinions, he never assumed a prominent political position before the public eye. The circumstances which brought upon him the penal notice of the Government were his moving the resolutions at the Abbey-street Theatre, which had been intended for the Clontarf monster meeting, and his speech on their general subject matter. One of them, although applicable to the theatre of Brian Boromhe's celebrated victory over the Danish invaders of his country, was not exactly the thing for the Abbey-street stage, where nothing more serious in the fighting line but melo-dramatic combats and circus charges of Batty's cavalry had ever taken place, and the words with which it set forth, "Here standing upon the graves of the valiant dead," were consequently looked upon at the time to all intents and purposes as an Irish bull of the very best breeding. It is but due to the reverend gentleman to state, that very recently he made a speech in the Conciliation Hall, in which he denied that he was one of those who wished for war whilst they preached peace and good will between the two countries, and he declared, that whilst as a man and Christian such duplicity would be unworthy of him, as a clergyman he could not sanction it in those who came within the sphere of his clerical influence, and who looked up to him for spiritual advice. His ministerial labours are exercised in the immediate neighbourhood of Louth, of which he is the parish priest, in the county of Dublin. He is upwards of fifty years of age is a clergyman also, but from a more remote district, being parish priest of Clontibret, in the county of Monaghan. It is but justice to this reverend gentleman to state that he is a great favourite with his parishioners, and has been on terms of social intercourse with the gentry of both political parties in his neighbourhood, his private [illegible] in the room to see [illegible] and [illegible] to set up to the knees of a spatable friendship. He was born in the parish of Donagh, in the county of Monaghan, in the year 1790, and he is consequently in his fifty-third year. In the year 1813, and the twenty-third of his age, he received holy orders; and in 1817 was appointed parish priest of Aughalurcher, in the county of Fermanagh. In the year 1820 he was transferred to the parish of Clones, and in 1824 again to the parish of Clontibret, where he at present resides, and is one of the Catholic canons of the chapter of the diocese of Clogher, of which the Right Rev. Dr. Kernan is the Roman Catholic Bishop. He has minded very actively in politics, and especially at the elections of his native county. In 1832, he took a very prominent part at the election which ended in the return of the Hon. Henry Westenra, now Lord Rossmore, and the defeat of Mr. Lucas, the present Under Secretary for Ireland. He is stated to have observed, recently, that it was particular's remarkable that whilst hundreds of the priests of Ireland had been speaking for a long time in all directions, and in stronger language, in favour of the repeal question, they had not attracted the attention of Government, and when he came forward to hand in a few pounds and make a few observations, he was deemed of sufficient consequence to be pounced upon with all the weight of state authority. If political martyrdom be a high honour in the eyes of his party, and to be cherished by gentlemen of his sacred profession, the reverend gentleman, in turning off the cassock, has the garb of the citizen orator, has proved his opinions to be of strong and signal attraction, and he has got pretty good value for his money.

JOHN O'CONNELL, ESQ., M.P.

This gentleman is third son of the O'Connell, and is about thirty-two or thirty-three years of age. He is a barrister, and is one of the judges of his father's circuit courts. He has sat in Parliament for the boroughs of Athlone and Youghal, and now sits for Kilkenny. He may be called the financial back-bone of the Repeal Association, it getting up the fiscal grievances of Ireland for his father, and affording pabulum of this kind, may be looked upon in this light. He was originally educated at the celebrated Catholic College, Clongowes Wood, in Kildare, where he highly distinguished himself. He afterwards entered the Dublin University, through which he quietly passed, without achieving, or, I believe, attempting, any particular academic distinction

Mr. John O'Connell is a remarkably amiable and respectable young man in private life, and is now about thirty-two years of age. He married not long since a lady of good family, a Roman Catholic like himself, and possessing, with a good fortune, a cultivated mind and rare personal attractions—Miss Ryan, of Jubilee Hall, in the County of Dublin.

MR. THOMAS MATTHEW RAY.

The Secretary of the Repeal Association is a striking instance of extraordinary times producing extraordinary men. He is about forty-four years of age, and we find him not only keeping terms at the Irish inns of court (the Queen's), but also in statu pupilari at the Dublin University, whilst at the same time he conducts the multifarious and intricate business of the Corn Exchange. The farmentering eye of the Repeal Commissariat was fixed upon him from the outset as the best quartermaster-general, and the object of his selection, by his comprehensive plans, and general tact as an administrator, very soon added another strong proof to the many already adduced of Mr. O'Connell's profound skill in moral mensuration and discernis of human character. Critically situated as Mr. Ray is at this moment, and our views respecting such positions as he occupies before the public eye too often depends on our political prejudices—without attempting, too, to prognosticate as to his future destiny—it must be agreed on all sides that the few leading facts of his past life prove the truth of the old sayings, that "[illegible] conquers everything," and, "it is never too late to be [illegible]." For this ineffatigable person shall hereafter claim as intimate an acquaintance with the literature of Athens as Cato, who turned his attention to its charming pursuit at a far later period of life, or prove himself as successful a merchant as understands as the son of Sophroniscus, who, after the fire of youth had been extinguished, and its hopes and passions were but a dream, founded an institution which, before long, caused empires to quake, and shook thrones to their centres—time and her Majesty's Attorney-General must show.

Mr. Ray began the world, I am informed, as a brewer's clerk, and subsequently followed the business of a scrivener. It is owing in a great measure to his long practice in this latter capacity, that his penmanship, which is exceedingly beautiful, can challenge comparison with any other specimen of calography in these countries. As an accountant he stands unrivalled in the city of Dublin, and there are many rather "smart" fellows in the Irish metropolis in this line on both side of the ledger. He is the great guide and repository of the statistics of the association, and by his arrangements a most perfect system of moral mapping in their way, which have a far greater extent and comprehension than people in England are by any means disposed to fancy: there is not a man in any part of Ireland who cannot in five minutes be known and "found out" where he is, who he is, what are his means, what are his opinions, what character he bears, and all about him. More than this could not be achieved through the most accomplished system of police under the most despotic Government in Europe. Having ample experience of his great knowledge of men and things as well as of his perfect business habits, [illegible] nds, and unerring tact in the patron, Mr. O'Connell, not long since advised him to turn his attention to the bar as a profession, inspiring him with the certain hope of future forensic honours, and no doubt a seat in Ireland's Parliament "when she gets it." To enable him to be called much sooner than he should be without an academic degree, he entered the Dublin University about a year back, and I have heard from many Trinity men that he passed his junior Freshman's examination very creditably. Mr. Ray has the reputation of being a very well informed man on general subjects, and is said to possess considerable taste for the arts which elevate and adorn life, and which, "to have cultivated accurately ought to soften men's manners, and permit them to be mild." It is needless to add, that such a person as this does not yield himself up to the fascinations of Irish convivial society, within the magic circle of which so many precious hours are lost, and so much of genius dies. He is "a man of business," with much of talent in his peculiar line to boast of, and much more of tact to depend on in difficult positions. He owes his present one, enviable or unenviable as it may be to himself; he has worked hard to gain it; and in all probability he will work harder to retain it:

Multa tulit fecitque puer, sudavit et [illegible]

Whether he is to be still more sweated and worked by fortune and the force of law, is not for me to opine, nor would it be fair, whilst sketching his portrait with anything but a political pencil, to express a hope one way or other as to his being "snuffed" or set free, but this much is certain, that Napoleon was stopped on his march to the east by "a man named Smith"—(Sir Sidney, at Acre)—and every body knows that this is the name of her Majesty's Irish Attorney-General

The charges against Mr. R[illegible]are for r[illegible] certain documents at the meetings of the Repeal Association, and for announcing the receipt of money from time to time [illegible]arding its objects.

[illegible]STELE

is of a very respectable Clare family, and was [illegible]inguished in early [illegible]n honourable acade[illegible] College, Dublin. His taste leading him more to[illegible] since than the cultivation of the [illegible]ancients, he proceeded shortly after—having taken his B.A. degree—to Cambridge, and was admitted ad eundem of Magdalen College of that University. It is stated of him, that shortly after he had taken his farewell of his Alma Mater, and being then in London, he could not make up his mind as to which of his "aunts," Oxford or Cambridge, he should favour with a sojourn until of standing to take his M.A. degree. Tom, whomever[illegible] knows is an enthusiast, and has acted through life on the principle of "primum opus est consulto, dein facto," was sitting in the evening at the time I speak of, and a beautiful summer evening it was, as ever blessed a Christian country, pulling at his weed and his liquor, and I should not be surprised if he was "flooring" the last problem of the "Academie des Sciences," computing the tidal forces, or contemplating the future navigation of his native Shannon; but where was he sitting? at the Bell and Crown, in Holborn: and, as he was sitting and sipping, and smoking and ruminating, and supervising the innyard from his niche in the window, in rolls the Cambridge coach with its four bloods, and "Hell-fire Dick," that celebrated gentleman of the road who could count the [illegible]'s ear with the lash of his whip without teazing the animal; and who used to say to a new tit when unruly, "perhaps you don't know who's sitting behind you!" Alas, Itoo an an old Cantab, and may be pardoned for indulging for a moment in the pleasing though melancholy recollection of dear old Granta, whom those who have ever been taught to love must love for ever. It happens with individuals as with nations, as everybody knows, that very often great events from trifling causes spring. The Cambridge coach called up associations of Cambridge, and our predestined and pious pilgrim started for the splendid and far-famed seat of science that same night by the mail. At that time, as at present, the down mail to London left Cambridge not very long after the arrival of the up mail from London, the up and down of the thing being reversed by university men.

We always go from London down to the north, although we always go up to Cambridge, which is in the same direction. A passing moonlight view of the most beautiful Gothic chapel in the world, as our hero passed along King's Parade, the fine effect of the other magnificent [illegible] structures "still standing" with the starry camps of night [illegible]ambridge was not then lit with gas), the memories of Newton, Bacon, Milton, and many more such mighty names, were not lost upon him. He took an hour's stroll and his supper, and returned to London by the other mail, fully determined that Granta was the thing for him and he the man for Granta. He soon carried his resolution into effect. His time at Cambridge was spent in the noiseless cultivation of his favourite pursuits, and during his sojourn he made the acquaintance and secured the friendship of some of the most honoured sons of the sister university. We next hear of him as a hero of the Pyrenees, and it is well known that he took a gallant part with Sir Robert Wilson and others of our brave countrymen in assisting the Spaniards to secure their constitutional liberty, which illfated war of independence was terminated in favour of despotic power shortly after the French army crossed the Pyrenees in 1823. Mr. Steele lost a great deal of his patrimonial inheritance in scientific investigations, and especially in endeavouring to improve the navigation of the Shannon at his own expense. He took a very prominent part in the agitation for Catholic emancipation, and rendered himself very useful to his political leader at the Clare and other southern elections. He also was engaged very prominently and constantly in the anti-tithe war in Ireland, which followed on the passing of the Relief Bill, and in 1831 he was prosecuted by Mr. Attorney-General Blackburne, for what was considered by the Crown officers a very violent speech which he made before a Kilkenny audience. When offering the required security for his appearance at trial, he said—"You had better take it for double, for I am about to make another speech that will be much worse." Tom, somehow or other, had no particular predilection for being tried by certain twelve of "the boys of Kilkenny," so he started for Limerick, where he felt himself more at home, and astonished the natives with one of the most violent harangues against the order of things that has been heard even in Ireland since the landing of Strongbow. This is still remembered by all who heard it or read it by the name of the Black Abbey Speech. "By way of no mistake," he addressed a letter to Mr. Attorney-General, calling his attention to a copy of his Limerick performance, which he enclosed to that functionary, with the name of Thomas Steele underscribed to it for the Government's accommodation. Many might think this the act of a madman; but such men are by no means as mad as cooler heads and calmer natures give them credit for. Very many embarrassments of the popular party in Ireland have been a Crown prosecution as an honour of the highest order. To succeed to imprisonment in the cause of their political party is amongst their most golden dreams of distinction on this side of the grave; whilst suffering for conscience sake, to drink of the cup of martyrdom, is according to their fond and firm hope, to be crowned in the other world with a bright reward. With practical public men in these times, and in these countries, patriotism, like charity, begins at home; and with such, the motto of Andrew Marvel should not be out of remembrance. The Government of the day prosecuted him for the Black Abbey Speech, and failed in its prosecution. In Ireland, above all other countries, the course of law has never yet run smooth. In Crown prosecutions, especially, you may have a clear case and be "cast," a bad one and gain a conviction. Morally speaking, you may feel yourself, on Christmas eve, under the influence of a vertical sun, or shove your toes into the fire and bring them out frozen, in similar fact concerning the [illegible] which took place at Limerick came to light not long afterwards. The jury consisted of ten Protestants and two Catholics. The latter were for finding the accused guilty for some time; but gave way to the former, [illegible] from the moment of entering the retiring [illegible] When the first news of [illegible] been already elected by the Government for penal notice. The list spoken of is the "real and true one" contained most of the names afterwards indicted, and others which were not, but Steele's name [illegible] not appearing in it, he stood up and threw open an apartment in which he had been sitting with Mr. O'Connell and others of the party, and after a good many turns he at last exclaimed, in accents of bitterest disappointment, "It was too bad to leave me out!" His chagrin, however, passed away next day, when he found that Government had [illegible] Mr. Steele is now in the front rank of danger, a [illegible] to occupy. He has passed the half centenary mark of years, with the snow-flakes of time thinly scattered over a very fine mathematical forehead. He would look very well in front of a cartoon of Cæsar's Tenth Legion landing between Deal and Dover, or as a veteran grandsire of the "Faughs-a-ballaghs," charging the French with the butt-ends of their muskets. He speaks very deliberately, although the sentiments he gives utterance to are of the hyper-enthusiastic; takes long contemplative steps eorum publicum; but walks hastily when he gets clear of the smoke and gains the country; has a very large head, and an honest face, both looking as though they were cut out of a block of granite; is a great lover of the arts, being very well acquainted with the works of the great masters of music, painting, and sculpture, and a thorough man of science, the slightest allusion to pure philosophy being sufficient to bring tears into his eyes; he is simple-minded, single-hearted, thoroughly sincere whether right or wrong—of all he says or does; and with all these qualifications, he is still a bachelor, the possessor of a veteran military blue frock with a repeal button, in which, its continuation, his virtue and the memory of the past, he involves himself this cold November's night during which he writes these not, I hope, ill-natured observations. It is a fact—which Whig, Repealer, and Conservative in Ireland, will readily acknowledge—that if the Repeal rent produced one hundred thousand pounds per annum, "Poor Tom," who seems to have taken the vows of poverty and passive obedience at the Green Man's shrine, would not benefit more in a pecuniary point of view by the monster collection than he does at present. Unlike the dwarf (in the "Citizen of the World") who forsook Lilliput after he found that he got all the wounds and none of the glory in the early adventures, our minor hero of the Repeal scenes as firm as his own name would import:

Me, me adsum qui feci in me convertite—FERRUM!

Thus upset into English:

Here I a[illegible] and do your worst;
Let me [illegible]ll your arrows feel
Five until your bow-strings burst
[illegible]ew—now comes it STEEL!

Poor fellow! he seems to enjoy this great State affair mightily; but it is no joke—nor is he likely to find it so no more than is the fearful condition of his wretched country. He is not the first poor [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] principle, and [illegible] [illegible] be the last

The charges against Mr. Steele are for attending the "monster meetings," and those within doors of the Repeal Association; for the speeches which he has delivered at both, and for the [illegible]ding in the collecting together of the said meetings.

was, in former years, situated very respectably in trade as a brewer, but gave up the chymistry of malt and hops for political fermentation. His efforts in party warfare were, at first, as a pamphleteer and writer for the Conservative, then called the Tory, press, in which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

(formerly the Irish Parliament), Trinity College, the Royal Exchange, the Custom House, New Post-office, &c. one cannot help thinking of the mineral and enlarged minds of their founders. The great temple of "Justice to Ireland" is situated on the north side of the Liffey. A new topographical work on Dublin,* just published, describes it so accurately that I cannot do better than transcribe a few passages:—

"Between the building and the river there is merely the usual width of the northern quays; but the parapet of the quays here experiences an alteration, as the light and handsome balustrade of the bridges is continued along the side of the river throughout the whole range of this edifice. The whole ground plan of this noble fabric and its dependent offices forms an oblong rectangle of about 440 feet long, and 170 feet in depth. The central pile, which is 150 feet square, contains the courts of judicature. On the east and west are courtyards, shut from the street or quay by a screen perforated with circular arches, and on the sides of these courts are placed the law offices.

"The central front presents a splendid portico, the pediment of which is sustained by six Corinthian columns, and is surmounted with statues of Moses, of Justice, and of Mercury. Over duplicated pilastres, near the two extremities of the front, are statues in a sitting attitude, representing Wisdom and Authority. Above the portico rises a lofty dome, encompassed by columns, with interspersed perforations for windows. In the arrangement of the interior subjects and magnificence are blended with a happy refinement of art. Within the square outline of 140 feet, which has been previously given for the dimensions of the building, is placed a circular hall, 64 feet in diameter, and in the angles of the square are formed the Four Court namely, the Court of Chancery, Queen's Bench, Exchequer, and Common Pleas. The hall is surmounted by columns of the Corinthian order. Above the entablature is an attic pedestal, embellished with eight sunk panels, and in the panels over the entrances into the courts is sculpture in bas-relief, representing William the Conqueror promulgating the Norman laws, King John in the supposed act of affixing his signature to Magna Charta; Henry the Second receiving the Irish chieftains; and James the First abolishing the Brehon laws. From the centre of the dome, between the windows of which are eight colossal statues in alto relievo, emblematical of Liberty, Justice, Wisdom, Law, Prudence, Mercy, Eloquence, and Punishment. The frieze over the windows contains medallions, charged with the representations of eight eminent legislators of antiquity, and the remainder of the dome is enriched with mosaic work. A new building for a Rolls Court, and a Nisi Prius Court, has been erected between the northern side of the main building and Pill-lane, on a piece of ground purchased for the purpose of isolating the structure in order to diminish the risk of fire, and to provide additional accommodation for the augmentation of legal proceedings.

"Previously to the year 1605, the four Law Courts were separate and ambulatory; but in that year they were assembled under one roof, and the building in which they were appointed to be held was situated in Christ Church-lane, a crowded and inconvenient portion of the city. The present building was commenced pursuant to the plans of Sir Thomas Cooley in 1776, and completed by Mr. Gandon, at an expense of about £200,000. To a stranger, the Hall of the Four Courts in term time affords a scene well worth observing; and no traveller should leave Dublin without visiting it. The hum, the bustle, and the various groupings, evince and impart feelings of peculiar animation no where else to be experienced. Men congregate there together, also to discuss other matters than points of law. Nothing takes place throughout the counter that is not there to be heard or seen; for you want to know all about the elopement of Miss Suchabody in the extreme north, with Sir Somebody Something, or the last clearance of my Lord Beckrent's small tenantry in the mild west, or the last homicide in Tipperary, you must go to the Hall of the Four Courts for information. In exciting times, too, like the present, it is the grand centre of excitement, and, as far as Ireland may be considered, the grand confluence of political existence."

IRELAND

THE STATE TRIALS.—No. 3.

The progress of the state drama now enacted before the legal tribunals of the Irish metropolis continues to be watched with unabated interest. Its importance to the union of Ireland and the empire has not failed to be generally appreciated; and in Ireland, indeed, it has excited an intense anxiety to which expression is inadequate, when produces a cessation even of the outcry of political rancour,—a feeling such as that which the poet of the field of Holmendon has described, when he wrote—

"Even the bravest held their breaths for a time."

All other topics appear to be thrown aside, and but urgent personal interests

The Attorney-General, as we stated in our last, had on Wednesday, in the Court of Queen's Bench, tendered a demurrer to the plea of abatement on the part of the traversers. The joinders to this demurrer were not handed in until Monday. Mr. Richard Shiel, Q.C. and M.P., appeared as counsel on behalf of Mr. O'Connell, in the proportion of the Attorney-General, to show cause against the conditional order for a criminal information obtained upon the 10th of July, against his client at the suit of Lord Hawarden, should not be made absolute.

The reason we have sought to assign for the alleged libel in the Nation newspaper, in which the noble lord was denounced as an "extirminator

The primary objection having been made by the counsel for the plaintiff, the case was ordered to stand over till Tuesday.

On Monday join ers to the plea of demurrer on the part of the Crown were handed in for the state traversers by the

Mr. Fox argued against the course on the ground that it was the practice of the court to allow four days from the time of putting in the joinder to a demurrer.

Mr. Shiel also reminded the court that the case of "Lord Hawarden v. Duffy" had been fixed for the next morning.

Judge Burton said the court had no doubt ordered the case of "Lord Hawarden v. Duffy" to stand over till Tuesday, but it made no rule that it should be heard the first. It must, therefore, be subject to the contingency of being called on in its turn.

The court ultimately ruled that the argument should be entered upon next morning.

On Tuesday morning more than usual anxiety was manifested by the bar and the public to obtain admission into the court.

Lord Ingestre and several distinguished strangers were accommodated with seats. Mr. Jones, the sculptor, was permitted to come within the outer bar, and was busily employed in sketching the various important personages of the scene for

Soon after the opening of the court, the Attorney-General said that the first thing to be done was, that the traversers should personally hand in the severa not as of joinder to the demurrer. He had on the previous day compared of the personality of their being handed in by their counsel.

The traversers accordingly severally had led in their joinders to the demurrer, the understanding being that they should be considered as so handed in by themselves on the preceding day.

The Attorney-General then proceeded to state the grounds on which he sought to sustain the demurrer he put into the plea of Mr. O'Connell, and others—the plea being one in abatement to the indictment, and the general traverse having been entered in our last week's publication, that the indictment had been found a true bill on the evidence of four witnesses, who were not sworn in open court, according to the provisions of the statute of the 6th of Geo. IV., chapter 37. Now, the point raised by the plea was, that the statute of the 1st and 2d of Victoria, chapter 37, which did away with these provisions, did not extend to the Court of Queen's Bench, but only to cases to arise on circuit, and to persons from that court would be sworn according to the provisions of the 56th of George III. Before he submitted to the Court the grounds on which he considered that the 1st and 2d of Victoria extended to the Queen's Bench, and the order of superior courts of error and terminer, he begged the attention of the Court to this fact,—that he was now seeking to support a construction of that act which had been put upon it by all the bar of Ireland and by the Government and the Crown assent. The first occasion on which it was not so was at the Commission Court, [illegible] the following Commission in January, 1840. The judges who [illegible] and jury on those occasions were the late Lord Chief Baron Woulfe and Lord Chief Justice Doherty [illegible] the jury that the form in which it would administer the oath to the witnesses sent before them in consequence of the alteration which had been made in the law, and by which the misdemeanour of administering it almost the confusion of a crowded court was avoided. Three of their Lordships had presided at similar Commissions since the passing of the act, and on those occasions the oath had been administered, not in court, but in the grand jury room. That practice had been followed in several instances, and it could be had been pronounced and carried into execution; and at the present moment hundreds of persons were undergoing sentence of transportation and imprisonment upon that construction of the act of Parliament. He carried these observations with regard to the construction of various statutes and high legal authorities that the 1st and 2nd Victoria extended to the Court of Queen's Bench, and that the plea of the traversers was consequently a [illegible]

Mr. O'Loghlen, Bart., and Mr. Moore, Queen's Counsel, were heard at considerable length for the traversers. Pennefather, the former learned gentleman observed, ought not to decide the case before them. Precisce might be, as it was, no doubt, to [illegible] points in many matters of detail, but on great points of law it was not allowed to govern the law. It had so been held by Lord Kenyon, in Ord Term Reports, [illegible] some eminent observations which related to the common maxim, communis error facit jus, were indeed most admirable. His lordship clearly laid it down that in law points that maxim could never [illegible] learned gentleman cited various authorities in support of the plea of the traverses. The Solicitor-General followed, and contended that the plea in abatement was bad, both in point of form and substance. He observed in conclusion that if the [illegible] happened to have been sworn in open court, according to the provisions of the 56th George III., the traversers would have fixed pleas in abatement, on the ground that those witnesses had not been sworn by the foreman and jury, in compliance with the provisions of the 1st and 2nd Victoria. (Laughter.) The Chief Justice, after a brief consultation with his brother judges, adjourned the court till next morning, when judgement would be given

IMPORTANT DECISION OF THE IRISH JUDGES.

From our own Reporter.)

DUBLIN, Wednesday Night.

[illegible]

At eleven o'clock this morning the judges took their seats upon the bench, and proceeded to deliver judgment upon the demurrer put in by the Attorney-General against the plea of a traversers.

The Chief Justice said that it had become his duty to deliver the judgment of the court in this case, and in doing so he was happy to have the complete concurrence of his learned brethren, who have both been argued with great anxiety and with great ability on both sides; and no doubt it was a case of particular importance as affecting the due administration of justice in that court, not merely with regard to the present parties who were now before it, but also as relates to the criminal convictions which had taken place in the city of Dublin at the Commission of Oyer and Terminer. Passing by objections as to the form of the plea, and proceeding to the merits of the question upon which it was principally argued, it was true construction of the 1st and 2nd of Victoria, chap. 37, the learned judge here repeated the substance of the arguments of counsel, which we have already printed, and said that after a great deal of argument, with due deliberation given to the case, and taking advantage of the aid that had been afforded him by able counsel on both sides, the decision of his mind, without any doubt, was, that the construction of the act of Parliament contended for by the traversers was correct.

It certainly would be an opening to a very strange and much to be lamented conclusion if the court should be of opinion that the construction contended for by the traversers was the correct one. To be put in a position [illegible] it was certainly a very great satisfaction to him to know, that his own opinion was the same as that held by Chief Justice Wolfe and Justice Moore, and practised by, and acted upon by them in their several charges, for many years past. He was glad of it, and so that he had come to his decision, but it was because he believed that it was the true construction of the act a question was that which was given by the Crown.

The learned judge then went on to refer to the authorities which bore upon the subject, and which supported his view of the case, alluded to the able manner in which the whole case was argued, and took occasion to remark, that the counsel for the traversers had very unnecessarily if not unwarrantably asserted that all the judges since the passing of the 1st and 2d of Victoria had been in error, and acting under erroneous impressions.

Mr. Justice Crampton, in a few words, expressed his concurrence with the decision of his learned brother, and said, that from the preamble and the whole face of the statute he was led to his present view of the case.

Mr. Justice Perrin followed more at length, and went into the law of the case, citing numerous authorities, proving that the preamble was a part of the statute, although it had been argued to the contrary by Sir Coleman O'Loghlen, and concluded by expressing his concurrence with the opinions of his brethren.

The court were also of opinion, that the form of the plea of abatement was bad and even on that ground alone it would not stand.

The Attorney-General now rose to move their lordships for an order, that the traversers should plead instanter, and cited several authorities.

Mr. Fitzgibbon, Queen's Counsel, opposed the motion and demanded a four-day rule to plead, saying, that it was a matter left to the discretion of the bench, and that it always inclined to the accused party; he cited several authorities in support of his argument.

Mr. Whiteside, Queen's Counsel, followed on the same side, and after quoting numerous authorities, appealed to the discretion of the Bench in an able and eloquent speech.

The Chief Justice decided against the traversers; he said that the plea in abatement was nothing more than a dilatory plea, and he saw no reason, nor was there any ground, why the Bench should concur with the views of the Counsel who had last addressed him

The Clerk of the Crown having then called on the parties to appear and plead, [illegible] the traversers severally tendered their pleas of not guilty to the charges alledged against them.

The Attorney General again rose and said that he would move on Friday next, that a day be appointed by the court for the trial of the traversers, and with according to the provisions of the act of Parliament. The traversers then left the court, which was densely crowded; but which, on their leaving, became almost instantaneously empty. The ordinary business of the term was then proceeded with.

The most extraordinary excitement pervades the whole city of Dublin. Mr O'Connell's speech to his disappointed repealers in the Corn Exchange and I venture to hear that he is rather downcast about the state of the jury list, report stating that the revision has gone very much against the hopes of the Repeal party. The number of Protestants returned on the jury panel is said to be very much more numerous than that of the Catholics. It will be remembered that the traversers have always first attacked the state of the jury list, with the object of having it revised, but they did not expect that the revision would make matters worse for them, which I am informed it has, to their great mortification. There are people who fancy, from the hint thrown out by the Standard, and the sudden quietness of the Government press of Dublin upon the subject, that ministers would make some move

SCENE FROM THE "BOHEMIANS."—MRS. YATES AND O. SMITH.

ADELPHI THEATRE.

The scene which is chosen in our illustration has been rarely excelled on the stage, either in the dramatic interest which it internally possesses, or the pathos and power which have been infused into it by the consummate skill of Mrs. Yates, and Mr. O. Smith, in their personations of Louise and Croco-Coroc, the broken-hearted abandoned. The transition from the intent of murder to the kinder emotions of parental fondness, on discovering his child in the person of his devoted victim, was pourtrayed with all the fearful truth of a Kean, by the latter;—while the sense of danger, gradually subsiding into the consciousness of security and affection, on discovering a long-lost parent, was as truly depicted by Mrs. Yates (whom we may call the queen of domestic tragedy) in her own peculiar felicity.

"Of voice—face gesture, and those nameless things
"Which make humanity so eloquent."

This quotation of ours puts us in mind of another, which we will give the reader: it is from the mad poet Lee—we cite from memory:—"There is a mournful eloquence in thy dumb grief, which doth outshame all clamorous sorrow!" This mutum poema—this silent history of the heart, is beautifully exemplified in the scene illustrated by our Artist.

HAYMARKET.

The lessee of this house is certainly the only one who dares, upon his own shoulders, to support the world of the legitimate drama—an Atlantean task truly, but one that ought to make every body who has any "strength of taste" to lend a hand. The real English comedy is only to be found at the Haymarket; no other house is national, for no other house has a nationally-disposed manager at the head of it. When within its merry precincts, it costs not much imagination to think that Murphy, Sheridan, Colman, Reynolds, Morton, and other worthies are still alive, for their undying wit may be heard there nightly in all its "immortal amaranth!" Knowles and Bulwer too have added some stars to the constellation of that native genius which is so often nebulated by the fog of French importation. In a word, we cannot say that the drama, par excellence English drama, is on the decline, as long as "its mirror is held up" in this establishment, where a just reverence for departed genius does not preclude a due appreciation of modern pretence, and the works of the by-gone masters are produced more as models than as things

To scare away the timid bird.

A new farce has been lately produced called "Laying a Ghost;" it was decidedly successful, although it is not altogether the most spirited production in the world. Who is to gain the prize offered by the manager for the best comedy? It is impossible to guess. Hundreds that had never dreamt of writing before, as well as many already practised hands, are busy preparing for the literary race, which after all will no doubt be won by some hitherto "mute, inglorious," distant relation of Apollo; but this we are sure of, that in the hands of Webster the rivals will have fair play.

PRINCESS'S.

On Monday last, a new farcetta, entitled "Out for a Lark," was produced at this house with complete success. The plot of it is easily told, being anything but intricate or bordering upon the involvements of Spanish construction; neither is it very original. The incident (for there is only one) consists of two domestics of a Vicecount Dashaway, taking advantage of the Continental absence of his son and daughter, and going out to have "a lark" for a day, personating or rather assuming the characters of the said offspring. As luck would have it, they meet an old admiral (Masthead) their would-be uncle, at the inn where they "put up," and succeed, despite their vulgarity, to make him believe they are his veritable relations. This imposition lasts until the true Simon Pures arrive; when, after a few explanatory scrubbics, their "real state is made t'appear," and the parodies of "My Lord Duke and Mrs. Kitty" are sobered down to their respective stations of valet and housemaid to the establishment of which they had previously professed themselves to be

The male and female representatives.

The construction of this trifle is not over ingenious; the dialogue makes no pretension to wit or even humour, and there is none of the "ars celandi finem," which conduces so much to interest us in a fiction of any kind. Notwithstanding all this, owing to the excellent acting of Mrs. Grattan, Mr. Walter Lacy, and Mr. Barnett, it went "trippingly off." The latter gentleman—who, when he is at home in a part, is one of the best actors in the world—was condemned to disguise his ability in a most unworthy depiction (on the author's part) of an Irishman—a kind of hybrid-mongrel thing between head waiter and boots, who seemed to be more master of "The White Hart Inn on the Dover Road" than the master himself. A stage Irishman is expected at least to be droll; but Barney O'Byrne is a fellow "of infinite"—nothing!

We cannot say farewell, even for a week, to this bijou of a theatre without noticing the orchestra. Although its members be not so numerous as we could wish, yet every component individual is a "good man and true," and ready and willing "to follow the leader," John Loder, who, perhaps, has led more trumps (being more able to lead them) than any chef d'orchestre of his time. The precision and light and shade of his band are in the highest degree worthy of the taste and judgment of their conductor.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

The celebrated Bouffé, the French comedian, has relinquished his engagement at the Gymnase, and devoted himself to the interest of the "Varieties," by which proceeding he will be once more enabled to appear in those parts, wherein he shows that "none but himself can be his parallel!"

BALFE.—The new Opera by this popular composer, now in preparation at Drury Lane, is to be called "The Bohemian Girl," instead of the "Gipsey."

LE PETIT COLBRUN, or Bouffé in miniature, had a handsome compliment thrown to him on Monday last; consisting of a little gold watch, concealed in a bouquet of roses. We could not but think of the truthful and melancholy words of the poet:

Ah! never does Time travel faster
Than when his way lies among flow'rs.

ENGLISH OPERA-HOUSE.

The great Jullien has commenced his winter campaign at this house, having collected together an orchestra, certainly one of the very best that can be heard. Among the names of the most distinguished are those of Barrett, Baumann, Harper, Platt, Richardson, Hill, Lazarus, Patey, Howell, and Jarrett. Herr Koenig, too, without whom Jullien's concert would seem impossible, is engaged, and, as usual, invariably carries off an encore. The great card of the season is M. Jullien's English quadrilles, a companion to the Irish and Scotch quadrilles, which have had such a vogue; and, if we may judge by their reception, this last will prove no less popular than the former. It introduces a number of the most popular melodies, with capital effect. Some of the latter portions, in which an immense number of fifes and drums are introduced, were very striking, and elicited an instantaneous encore. The present is a fitting opportunity for introducing to our readers portrait-sketches of three of the most eminent artistes at these delightful concerts.

LAZARUS,

FIRST CLARINET AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE—PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS—PROVINCIAL FESTIVALS, &c.

Some five-and-thirty, or forty years ago, the clarinet was not known in this country as an instrument capable of "discoursing" such "eloquent music," as it is now universally acknowledged to be. The oboe (or haut-bois) held its place, and was in such high favour, that no overture to an opera was deemed perfect which had not some portion (and that not the least) assigned to its performance. Things worthy in themselves are often indebted to accident for their advancement; and so it happened to the clarinet. When Parke, the celebrated oboist, was in his zenith, he happened to insult a certain well-known composer, who was then engaged in the composition of an opera for one of the principal winter houses. The revenge which the son of Apollo took upon his victim, was almost as severe as that which the god himself bestowed upon his presumptuous rival, Marsyas, for, although he did not flay him alive, he rendered him dumb in that orchestra where he used to be so eloquent before, substituting the clarinet (in the skilful hands of Hopkins) for the previously monopolizing and deemed indispensable hautboy. From that time it has rapidly gained favour, through the delightful instrumentation of Mahon, Cramer, and Willman. These great performers are now no more; but their loss is amply compensated in the living subject of the present notice, who includes in his individualism all the various perfections of his predecessors. Purity of tone, elegance, and a "happy finess for all styles," have elevated our countryman Lazarus to the position of not only principal clarinet at her Majesty's Theatre, but also to that rank in every orchestra throughout the kingdom where first-rate talent is employed. He need not fear any foreign competition. Any one who has heard him perform the voice part of Haydn's divine air, "With verdure clad," cannot much deplore the absence of the words: he is vocal without their aid, and "delightful to the ravish'd sense!" The school he has been reared in has been most prolific of genius, and reflects the highest credit upon its head and instructor, Godfrey, the master of the Coldstream band. Under him have graduated the following professors, who can take their stand by the side of any others in their respective departments—the two Keatings (oboe and bassoon), Dean (clarinet), Jarrett (one of the finest horn players in Europe), Handley (trombone), and a host of others that may "fearlessly challenge, and dread no defeat."

JULLIEN.

M. Jullien, or, as he aristocratically subscribes himself, "Jullien," is a personage of much talent, infinite industry, and perseverance, combined with a certain degree of confidence, that generally creates confidence in others, and who holds in abhorrence that humble aphorism of Doctor Faustus, which says, "On their own merits modest men are dumb." Jullien, on the contrary, is not a silent man—his soup d'archet is a proclamation—his most piccolo fiato is a whirlwind—and his very look indicates the presence of "somebody determined to do something," and make a noise in the world. Well, he does, and most effectively does, something. He lethargizes his auditory (?) to the most magnificent compositions of Beethoven, Weber, &c., but has the magician's power of awaking them to the highest and most attentive "qui vive," on striking up an English quadrille! This is mesmerism at command. But, badinage apart, Jullien is a man of considerable ability, and highly deserves the patronage bestowed upon him. It is not his fault, that the people will not relish the delicious fare he provides for them in the principal dishes he serves up; and, if it be their penchant to "feed more scurvily," we can only exclaim, with Timon—

"Uncover, dogs! and lap."

KŒNIG.

The cornet à piston is one of those modern musical inventions of such beauty and excellence as would make Mozart (if he could resume his "mortal coil" again) "list and be enchanted." We think that the fervid imagination displayed by the author of "Il flauto magico" would have been quite wrapped in "empyrean ecstacy" if he heard Herr Kœnig "dulcet forth" that exquisite morceaux of poor Bellini, "A te o cara." Rubini was never more capable, even with the assistance of words, to produce a more beautiful effect. It enwrapt us in the highest enjoyment of the seraphic art, and induced us to exclaim with "the Poet of all nations, and idol of his own;"—

"Music! Oh! how faint—how weak
Language fades before thy spell—
Why did Feeling ever speak,
When thou canst breathe her soul so well?"

The cornet à piston is an instrument capable of the most touching expression, particularly in the hands of Herr Kœnig, who is an artiste that imparts the "music of his soul" to it, and captivates his hearers by his own devotion. We sincerely hope that his benefit on Tuesday night was not "a farewell one," but that we shall have future and frequent opportunities of being delighted by his matchless performance.

KŒNIG.

THE FAREWELL.—CARLOTTA GRISI AND PETIPA, IN THE "PERI."

DRURY-LANE

Carlotta Grisi took her farewell of an English audience on Saturday night in the popular ballet of "The Peri," when a brilliant company was present to bid adieu to their favourite dancer. On the entrance of Mdlle. Grisi, there was one unanimous burst of applause, and each movement of her graceful figure was the signal for renewed approbation. When the famous leap was given, cries of encore re-echoed from every part of the house, and once again the favourite, with a spirit undaunted, leaped into the arms of the lover of the ballet. The applause continued undiminished until the fall of the curtain—then the enthusiasm became a furore, and the name of "Grisi" was uttered by a thousand voices. She soon appeared, led on by Petipa, and in looks more expressive than words, spoke her thanks for the kindness which she has received and merited. Wreaths and bouquets were plenteously showered on the dancer, and our artist has attempted a representation of the enthusiastic scene.

After the performances, Mr. Bunn gave an elegant supper in the grand saloon of the theatre to about seventy of his friends and patrons. The entertainment was intended as a complimentary leave-taking to Carlotta Grisi, on her quitting London to fulfil her engagements in Paris. After proposing the health of Carlotta Grisi, Mr. Bunn presented that lady with a superb bracelet of black enamel, richly ornamented with diamonds, as a slight souvenir of her highly successful career at Drury-lane Theatre. Attached to the bracelet was the following inscription:—"Presenté à Mdlle. Carlotta Grisi, la danseuse la plus poétique de l'univers, avec les hommages respectueux de son directeur A. Bunn, Théatre Royal, Drury-lane. 18th November, 1843."

A new ballet was produced at this house on Monday last, entitled "The Devil in Love," an English translation (if pantomime be translatable) from Le Diable Amoureux, which has so captivated the Parisians. "The Devil in Love" is an odd title, and the piece or ballet which bears this name is something more odd still; for instead, as we are led to expect, of his Satanic majesty being smitten with the tender passion, it appears that it is one of his "missionaries"—"a shelling of most delicate sensibility," who becomes the amoureux and à force of her passion, and devotedness to her intended victim saves him from the machinations of her employer, and herself ultimately by an act of involuntary virtue. This ballet, which was produced most magnificently, "restored to our longings" the best pantomimist in the world, Mdlle. Pauline Leroux, and introduced a new dancer, M. Carey, who is about the most gracefully-active danseur that ever "tripp'd the scene!" This theatre continues to be fully and fashionably attended.

It is said in the City that Lord Aberdeen has declined to enter into any negotiation with the Mexican Minister, Mr. Murphy, on the subject of the affront lately offered to the British flag, and that he intends sending out a new minister to Mexico, in a frigate, which will call at Jamaica, whence the minister will take a squadron down with him to the Mexican coast, and require an apology for the affront before landing.

The ship-building trade in Sunderland, which in common with the other interests of that port has been so long depressed, is beginning to show signs of revival, several orders having recently been received for ships to be built for the Indian trade.

We have much pleasure in announcing, that Lieutenant Edward Walter Agar and Miss Daizell (passengers), with the remainder of the crew of the ill-fated Memnon, arrived safely at Aden, on the 9th of September.

Lord Alfred Paget, who arrived in town on Monday night from his regiment in Wilts, to obtain his leave of absence of a month from the Horse Guards, was suddenly ordered to rejoin his regiment by the military authorities, purposely to accompany his troop from Trowbridge to Salisbury, as riots were feared from the excitement which prevailed in that city.

DESTRUCTIVE CONFLAGRATION AT PIMLICO.

On Monday morning, at half-past three o'clock, a very extensive conflagration, consuming, before it was extinguished, an immense mass of most valuable property, broke out on the spacious premises, formerly Bramah's, but now belonging to Mr. Robinson, engineer, and situate partly in Eaton-lane, and the Pimlico-road.

The fire was first discovered at the hour just mentioned, by police constable 155 B. He endeavoured to spread an alarm, but before any assistance arrived, flames burst forth, penetrating the roof of the building.

In very little more than a quarter of an hour, seven of the brigade engines, one of the County, and one of the West of England fire offices, together with the parish engine, and one from Messrs. Elliot's brewery, had arrived; but unfortunately there was a lack of water for some time.

By this time the flames had reached the engineering department—an extensive building, in length about 100 feet, and in depth nearly 40, and which was the general depôt of the most valuable contrivances and apparatus. The flames spread thence to the pattern and model workshops, the receptacle for inventions that can with difficulty be restored, and in less than a quarter of an hour this valuable building appeared a dense and vivid body of fire.

At a quarter to five o'clock, the fire-mains supplying water abundantly, all the engines could be worked with full power. This was fortunate, for at this period the fire was attacking the roof of the foundry. The vigour, however, with which the engines were worked stopped its progress in this quarter. It was here discovered that the fire was progressing in the direction of Belgrave-street South, and that it had already reached the roof of the School of Industry, of St. George's parish, in the street just named. The flames, happily, were arrested before they had made any further advance in this direction. The engines continued to be worked incessantly until about half past six o'clock, when the flames receded.

The number of workmen lately employed on Mr. Robinson's premises amounted to about 120. Several of them, especially the carpenters, have lost their tools On Saturday evening they were at work in the factory up to eight o'clock, casting a heavy shaft. They left off work then, and when they quitted the factory everything appeared safe. On examining the premises, after the fire had been extinguished, it was discovered that they had been broken into, and some pieces of brass were found stained with blood, near the counting-house, through which, it was reported, a forcible entry had been made. This circumstance, coupled with another, about to be mentioned, tends to establish an impression that the fire was the act of an incendiary.

Superintendent Braidwood reports the entire destruction of the engineering and pattern shops, with their valuable contents. No. 1, Belgrave-street South, the School of Industry, of St. George's parish, has the roof of its workshops burned, and has its back part extensively injured by fire. Nos. 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, and 11, in Upper Ranelagh-street, have their back premises more or less injured. The house No. 1, Eaton-lane, is also much damaged at the back. Mr. Robinson is insured in the Sun, Phœnix, Imperial, and Royal Exchange fire-offices.

IMPROVEMENTS IN TRAVELLING.—A Brussels paper states from good authority that an English company will establish a daily communication between Folkstone and Ostend by steam-boats which, draw so little water that they can enter both ports at low water; so that travellers leaving London in the morning by the railway to Folkstone, will arrive at Ostend towards evening. Another English company will open a communication three times a week between Blackwall and Ostend. The steamers will perform the passage in nine or ten hours, and always arrive at Ostend so as to be able to enter the port. They will also leave Ostend in the morning, if the tide suits. Thus travellers, who arrive in the evening by the railway from Cologne, may reach London in the afternoon of the following day.

A correspondent states that her Majesty's Government has determined upon placing the statue of his Majesty George IV., by Chantry, upon the eastern pedestal of Trafalgar-square, opposite St. Martin's church, whilst the statue of King George III., by Wyatt, in Cockspur-street, is to be removed from its present position and placed upon the western pedestal, opposite the College of Physicians; and the steps, the lions, and the railings by Nelson-sqaure will be proceeded with immediately. Another decision has been come to, viz., the removal of St. Margaret's church, Westminster, from its present locality to a more eligible site. The funds and the site have been both provided, and the work will be commenced during the present year.

MR. OASTLER.—The friends of Mr. Richard Oastler are making great and praiseworthy exertions to raise a fund for his liberation from prison. A numerous meeting of delegates from Leeds, Wakefield, Bradford, Huddersfield, Halifax, Keighley, and other towns in the West Riding of Yorkshire, was held at Robert Town, in the said Riding, on Wednesday last, and it was resolved that it was desirable to hold public meetings in various parts of the kingdom, in order to establish a fund, to be called "The Oastler Liberty Fund." It is intended that the surplus of the projected fund, after paying off the debt of Mr. Oastler, shall be applied to the purchase of an annuity for him

FIRE AT "BRAMAH'S" FACTORY, PIMLICO.

EXTRAORDINARY PEDESTRIANISM.

A walking match against time, similar to the celebrated feat of 1,000 miles in 1,000 successive hours, has just terminated at Leeds. A young man named James Searles, a native of Leeds (of whom we annex a portrait sketch), commenced the arduous task, on Monday, the 2nd of October, on a piece of the public highway, in the neighbourhood of Holbeck, which is in the borough of Leeds. He always walked two miles in immediate succession, one at the termination, and the other at the beginning, of every hour, and continued to walk in that way until five o'clock in the afternoon of Monday, the 13th instant, having occupied nearly six weeks in the performance, during the whole of which period, by the terms of the feat, he was never allowed to sleep for more than an hour and a half at a time. The actual distance between the Shakspeare Inn, Meadow-lane, and the Peacock

JAMES SEARLES, THE PEDESTRIAN.

Inn, Huddersfield-road, which formed the termini, betwixt which Searles performed his feat, is sixty-three yards over and above a mile, so that the pedestrian, taking into account the additional number of hours he continued to walk, has, in fact, traversed 1,052 miles, 1,400 yards, in 1,017 hours, a feat unparalleled in the annals of pedestrianism. He felt the effects of his extraordinary task most in the first two weeks, when, from his harassed appearance, many persons felt perfectly confident that he would break down, but he afterwards rallied, and, at the conclusion, was generally thought to be better in health even than when he began. He is a man of low stature, and rather delicate appearance, but, we understand, has been inured to hardship and fatigue during the whole course of his life. He was "chaired" on Tuesday, in an open coach, in which, along with five or six other persons, who constituted "the committee of management," he was drawn through the principal streets of the town, accompanied by a band of music, and a large concourse of people. Several bets, but not to any heavy amount, depended on the issue of the undertaking. Some presents have been made to the pedestrian, which, together with his gratuitous living during the performance of the feat, constituted his only remuneration.—Leeds Times.

An ingenious invention has just been exhibited, and its powers tried on the Brighton and Croydon railway. It is called a pedometer machine. It weighs 270lbs., and is manufactured almost entirely of wrought iron. It carries four or six persons, two of whom propel it by means of treadles, applied on a new and advantageous principle. Its greatest speed for a short distance is at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour; its average rate is fifteen miles an hour, carrying in both cases four passengers. Its utility on a line of railway requires no comment.

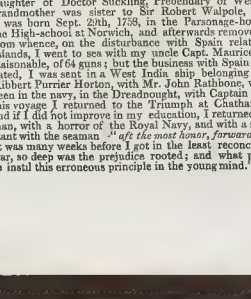
An Edinburgh paper states that, on the morning of Sabbath, a great quantity of smuggled tobacco, amounting to some tons in weight, was discovered lying on the sea beach adjoining our harbour. Such a discovery has naturally created a good deal of excitement.

There are upwards of 12,000 seamen generally out of employ in the metropolis, residing in districts between London Bridge and Vauxhall. Many of them, however, find employment in or about the docks, or other casual employment, during the winter season. On Tuesday morning there were, on the lowest estimate, 500 seamen promenading the limited districts of St. Katherine's and the London Docks in search of employment.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

BURNHAM THORPE PARSONAGE, THE BIRTHPLACE OF NELSON.

The village of Burnham Thorpe, in the northern division of the county of Norfolk, will long be cherished in remembrance as the birthplace of the illustrious Nelson, whose father was vicar of the parish. In Nelson's Memoir of his Services, which he obligingly wrote for Mr. Arthur's life of the great hero, we find the following details of his birth and boyhood:—



BIRTHPLACE OF NELSON—BURNHAM THORPE.

"Horatio Nelson, son of the Rev. Edward Nelson, Rector of Burnham Thorpe, in the county of Norfolk, and Catherine his wife, daughter of Doctor Suckling, Prebendary of Westminster, whose grandmother was sister to Sir Robert Walpole, Earl of Orford. I was born Sept. 29th, 1758, in the Parsonage-house; was sent to the High-school at Norwich, and afterwards removed to Northwa; from whence, on the disturbance with Spain relative to Falklands Islands, I went to sea with my uncle Capt. Maurice Suckling, in the Raisonable, of 64 guns; but the business with Spain being accommodated, I was sent in a West India ship belonging to the house of Hibbert Purrier Horton, with Mr. John Rathbone, who had formerly been in the navy, in the Dreadnought, with Captain Suckling. From this voyage I returned to the Triumph at Chatham, in July, 1772; and if I did not improve in my education, I returned a practical seaman, with a horror of the Royal Navy, and with a saying, then constant with the seaman "aft the most hour, forward the better man." It was many weeks before I got in the least reconciled to a man of war, so deep was the prejudice rooted; and what pains were taken to instil this erroneous principle in the young mind."

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

NORTH YARMOUTH, Nov. 16.—The foul weather flag, established to point out to the commanders of cruizers, and masters of merchant vessels anchoring in this roadstead, that it would be dangerous and unsafe for ships' boats to land, will in future be hoisted at a mast erected at the end of the jetty here, and not at the Coast Guard flag-staff, as heretofore.

DESTITUTION in the METROPOLIS.—ROYAL FREE HOSPITAL for the DESTITUTE SICK and DISEASED, Gray's-inn-road (near Queen-square-street), founded A.D. 1828. Patron—THE QUEEN

The Hospital, which is entirely devoted to destitution in its most appalling and pitiable form, viz., accompanied by sickness and disease, is now established on a scale of sufficient magnitude, with proper arrangements, to enable it to be rendered available for the reception of all the "casual poor" of this great metropolis. It requires but the funds in order to have 200 beds immediately available for the reception of cases, the most wretched of our fellow-creatures. Moreover, it gratuitously affords medical advice and medicine to more than, on average, than 1,800 out patients a week.

It is wholly supported by voluntary subscription, has no funded property of its own, nor any other income than that which is contributed by the philanthropic portion of the community. To this it owes its present existence, and by the Committee that the period of re-[illegible] tation and consequent sickness and peril of life. Its doors are daily thronged with the most miserable objects, and on great occasions the demand upon its resources, in consequence, during the whole summer, that it has been compelled to borrow, to a large [illegible] from the fund subscribed towards the new building, to defray the current expenses.

Contributions will be kindly received by Messrs. Coutts and Co., Messrs. Drummond and Co., Messrs. Herries and Co.; Messrs. Smith, Payne, and Smiths, Messrs. Glyn and Co.; Messrs. Hoare, Loyd, and Co.; Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, and Co.; Messrs. Denison and Co., Messrs. Williams, Deacon, and Co.; Messrs. Prescott and Co.; Messrs. Ransom and Co.; Messrs. Overend, Gurney, and Co.; Messrs. Nisbet and Co., Bevaers street; and at the Secretary's Office, by the Rev. R. G PACKMAN, Sec.

Cast-off apparel, male and female, will be gratefully acknowledged.

WHITTAKER'S IMPROVED EDITIONS OF PINNOCK'S CATECHISMS

1. PINNOCK'S CATECHISM of MODERN GEOGRAPHY, in simple Language, but on scientific principles, for Pupils in Grammar Seminaries. Improved Edition, by G. H. Smith, Esq., M.G.S., &c. With Ten Maps (especially engraved on a new principle). 18mo price 3s. sewed.

Its great popularity of this Catechism has induced Messrs. Whittaker and Co. to expend a considerable sum in editing and illustrating it, and a desire having been expressed by the higher class schools, it has been arranged so as to lay a foundation for a splendid knowledge of Geography, by a Gentleman of the highest attainments in the science. It may require a slight degree of application on the pupil at first, but will be found ultimately to afford him a sound and enlarged basis for a correct knowledge of the subject. It should be ordered as "Smith's Improved Series."

2. PINNOCK'S CATECHISM of MODERN GEOGRAPHY, being an easy Introduction to the Knowledge of the World and its Inhabitants; the whole of which may be committed to memory with ease, and adapted to the Infant Preparatory Schools. The original Edition, brought down to the present state of Geographical Knowledge. With Ten Maps in Maps 32mo., price 2s. sewed.

. Care should be taken to order Whittaker's Edition of all Pinnock's Catechisms and Histories, as, from their unrivaled popularity, unprincipled attempts are made to substitute works of a somewhat similar appearance. Messrs. Whittaker and Co. have expended very large sums, both in the purchase of the original copyrights, and in procuring the highest talent in each department of art or science in editing them, and are determined to protect their property and public the from being imposed upon by surreptitious imitations

TO PARTIES REQUIRING MACHINERY AND STEAM-VESSELS

HAVING lately COMMENCED BUSINESS as a CONSULTING MECHANICAL ENGINEER, I am prepared to offer my services for the following objects, viz.:—

1st. To give Plans and Specifications for Steam Engines and other Machinery, either for this country or for abroad; also, for Iron Vessels.

2nd. To superintend the same when in course of construction.

3rd. To give opinions on scientific subjects generally.

4th. To be employed as Referee in arbitrations and surveys, and value Machinery and Iron Vessels.

5th. To act as Agent for the sale or purchase of Machinery and Iron Vessels.

I have had many years' practical experience in the mechanical engineering establishment, in which machinery of the best description was made, and have also, during the same time, been much engaged in the construction of iron vessels. I have in my employment good and numerous draftsmen, and have command of a good naval draftsman. I am not connected with any engineering or other establishment, and enquiries may, if necessary, be in a strictly confidential.

Reference may be made through any respectable mercantile house of this town.

The Scottish Union Insurance Company may be most favourably contrasted with any similar institution. Unexceptionable Security is guaranteed by its subscribed Capital of Five Millions sterling—divided, at its origin in 1824, amongst Five Thousand Proprietors.
At the First Division of Profits, which took place at 1st August, 1841, a bonus, averaging Fourteen per Cent., or Two per Cent. per annum on the Sum Assured, was added to the Policies. A few extracts from the Company's Books at once prove the practical effects resulting from the plan peculiar to this Company.

IMPORTANCE OF APERIENT MEDICINE.—Yesterday afternoon, Mr. Higgs held an inquest at the Red Lion, Strand, on the body of Mr. Henry Butcher, aged 60, a master tailor, of No 3, Catherine street. It appeared from the evidence of Mrs. Kent, deceased's housekeeper, that on Tuesday evening last, about nine o'clock, she went to the shop shutters, and was in the act of turning off the gas, when he fell backwards on the shop floor in the most profound state of insensibility. She immediately sent for Mr. Smith, a surgeon, and for Mr. Wild, the newsvender, an old friend of deceased, both of whom arrived instantly. Mr. Smith pronounced it a decided case of death, from the rupture of a vessel of the brain, he had no doubt. In answer to the coroner, Mrs. Kent said that Mr. Butcher deceased had enjoyed better health than usual latterly; but that for a couple of days previous to his death he complained of pain in his head, and said he would arrest off better at dinner, and substitute toast and water. He seldom or never took aperient medicine. The coroner remarked if he had, he might be alive now. He considered that the want of aperient medicine was the greatest consequence in middle aged men, and he had remarked that for the last twenty-five years not a single medicine, man had died suddenly in the densely populated city of Westminster. On inquiry he found the same to be the case with the faculty took to keep the bowels in a proper state. He considered such a fact could not be too generally known and kept in view. Verdict, "Died by the visitation of God."—Morning Herald of Friday, October 20, 1843.—The verdict of the jury, instead of "Died by the visitation of God," ought to have been DIED FOR THE WANT OF APERIENT MEDICINE. Had this unfortunate man the means of PARR'S LIFE PILLS would have saved Mr Butcher's life! These Pills are acknowledged to be the best aperient medicine known. The excellent aperient, safety of action of its high character, has extended itself to all parts of the world; and therefore its healing virtues may justly be considered universal. Agents [illegible] in every town in the United Kingdom, and persons desirous of obtaining the character of Parr's Life Pills may obtain printed copies of authenticated testimonials, [illegible] satisfactory proofs of cures effected by this remedy. The following is a list of Wholesale Agents: London Edwards, St. Paul's Churchyard; Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton, Bow Churchyard. Manchester [illegible]. Edinburgh—J. and R. Raimes and Co., Wholesale Druggists. Dublin—Mac-[illegible] D'Olier street. Paris—Robertson and Co., and Prunt Place Vendome. New York, Dyett, Broadway. Sold in boxes at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and at family packets 11s. The Hon. Commissioners of Stamps have ordered the words "Parr's Life Pills" to be engraved on the Government Stamp, pasted round the sides of each box, in WHITE letters on a RED ground. Purchasers are also requested to observe that a fac-simile of the proprietors' signature "T. ROBERTS and Co., Crane court, Fleet-street, London," is printed on the direction wrapper round each box, without which none are genuine.—Beware of imitations.

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE

By HENRY COCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "VALENTINE VOX," "STANLEY THORN," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

ACTING upon the advice of Mr. Blincall, Mrs. Darnley was comparatively calm, and determined to await with patience the issue of Greville's interview with her amiable husband. Nor was the subject again adverted to that day by Darnley. He fully expected that some one would call for the purpose of pleading her cause, and had made up his mind to turn the advocate out without any unnecessary delay; but when in the morning he found that Greville was the advocate engaged, he, instead of exhibiting symptoms of anger, received him with the utmost cordiality and warmth, and acknowledged divers appropriate congratulations on his marriage, with every demonstration of delight; for, as he knew Greville well, and had a high appreciation of the tenacity with which he adhered to his pet principle, he resolved on adopting that principle himself, with a view to his own complete justification. The subject was not, however, named for some time—various irrelevant topics having been started and discussed with great freedom, such, at length, Greville said, "Well, now, my dear friend, I just want to have five minutes' quiet conversation upon a matter of business."

"With great pleasure," returned Darnley, who, of course, knew at once what that business was.

"It has reference," resumed Greville, "to a certain sum of settlement. Gertrude just called upon me yesterday, to request that I would speak to you on the subject. You know what I mean."

"A settlement—oh—ah—yes—exactly. Aye, the thing was mentioned yesterday—I remember—yes very good."

"Well, now you and I, you know, can come to some arrangement, of course "

"No doubt of it, my dear Sir, no doubt."

"Well, then, it appears, you see, from what I can understand, that, just before your marriage with Gertrude, you promised—or, rather, it was understood—that you would make a sort of settlement upon her. You understand me?"

"Oh, perfectly; and I am very glad indeed that you have been thus commissioned to arrange the thing with me. Mr. Greville, you are a man of the world, and, therefore, as a man of the world, I can speak to you on this subject without the slightest apprehension of being met with vulgar prejudices and narrow views."

Greville bowed, and with a smile which plainly signified that the compliment met his entire approbation.

"It is perfectly true," pursued Darnley, "that it was, as you observe, understood that that settlement should be made immediately after my marriage with your amiable sister. Very well. Now you see, Mr. Greville, I, previously to this, entertained the belief that at least the majority of those domestic evils which afflict married persons in a decent sphere, were ascribable chiefly to the fatal habit of making wives, in a pecuniary sense, independent of their husbands. I was, therefore, at first most unwilling to follow a fashion which, to me, appeared to be so preposterous; but from the reference I have mentioned that, if ever settlement were to be made, it would be made, and that, if, on the other hand, it were not, it would not, I countenanced this understanding as a matter of course."

"Very good," observed Greville, "very good. You countenanced it, in the firm conviction that you had no control, either one way or the other."

"Precisely! knowing that things must take their course."

"Excellent!"

"Well, what follows? Why, that this settlement has not been made; which alone, at once, comprehends all; inasmuch as it is, of course, abundantly clear, that if it were to have been made, it must certainly would have been made—"

"I perfectly agree with you, Sir," said Greville.

"While the fact of its not having been made affords the strongest conceivable proof that it was not to be made."

"Exactly: that is to say, as far as we have gone."

"Why, of course: I do not speak with reference to futurity. That would be ridiculous, indeed. I may have to do it still; and, if I have, it will be done; nothing can be more clear, or more certain, than that. But it cannot be done, unless I am to do it."

"Of course not. No, that's altogether out of the question."

"I am happy, Mr. Greville, to speak on a subject of this description with a man of the world like yourself. There are, unfortunately, but few men to whom I could explain myself on a point of the character with any effect. I should not be understood. My views and feelings would be mistaken. Many would contend that my conduct was dishonourable, and ascribe to me all sorts of unworthy motives. They would say at once, 'Why, as you made the promise, you ought, as a matter of course, to perform it.' But you—who perceive the absurdity of making promises, on the one hand, and of censuring a man for the non performance of promises, on the other—can be guilty of no such folly. It is, I repeat quite refreshing to converse with a man of your character, seeing that it is only from such a man as you that one can expect justice."

"And I assure you, Mr. Darnley, that I am much pleased to find that your views on this great point so strictly coincide with my own; and I, as I stated to make promises, and equally absurd is it to condemn a man because he is rendered unable to perform them. I perfectly agree with you; and, as we understand each other now, Mr. Darnley, why, as far as that settle nent is concerned, we need not say another word about the matter, seeing that the whole thing amounts but to this, that, if you are to make a settlement, you'll make it."

"Exactly. And now, my dear Sir, let us have a glass of wine. I have been delighted, I assure you, with this conversation, and I trust that our friendship may be permanent."

Greville responded to this with great politeness; and, when the wine had been produced, they sat, and sipped, and chatted on various subjects, with apparently the most perfect unanimity of feeling.

Mrs. Darnley, however, during the whole of this time was in a state of suspense the most painful. It is true she inferred, from the fact of the wine having been ordered, that Greville was making great progress towards the realisation of her hopes; but having made up her mind to leave Darnley at once, in the event of his making a settlement upon her, she naturally panted to know the result.

Of course, this impatience on her part was not for one moment considered by Greville. He was, in fact, so highly pleased with Darnley, that while conversing with him he scarcely thought of her at all: nor would he, on leaving him, have remained to communicate to her the result of the interview, had she not been on the qui vive. He would not have considered it necessary. It wouldn't have answered his purpose, as the best means of getting rid of her was to let him out, she encountered him on the stairs, it did occur to him that she might, perhaps, feel a little anxious, and he therefore on once left her side and went to the door.

"Well, Alexander," she enquired impatiently; "well, how is it to be?"

"Oh, make your mind easy, dear."

"Then he has consented to settle all upon me?"

"Why, if it is to be done, he will."

"If it is to be done! Alexander! what am I to understand by that? It must be done, sir!"

"Well, then, of course he'll do it."

"But when will he do it?"

"Why, when it must be done."

"Alexander. I am not to be trifled with; when I ask you, sir, a straightforward question, I expect to have an equally straightforward answer. Will he make this settlement, or not?"

"Why that, it is impossible for us to tell."

"Has he consented to do so?"

"No."

"Has he refused?"

"No."

"Then what on earth has he done?"

"Why he has proved himself to me to be a man of strong mind and sterling sense."

"How, how has he proved this?"

"Why, by his comprehensive view of things, and general conversation."

"Alexander, what does he mean to do in this matter?"

Really, Gertrude, it is perfectly useless to talk about what a man means to do: the great point is, what must he do?"

"What must he do! Alexander, I have positively no patience with you. Upon my life you are growing worse and worse. Do you wish to drive me mad?"

"No, Gertrude, no! certainly not."

"Then tell me at once—without being ridiculous—whether I am to have a settlement or not"

"Now really, as I said before, it is quite impossible for us to tell, Gertrude."

"Has he consented, or has he refused?"

"Why has he neither consented nor refused absolutely."

"What is the result of your interview with him?"

"The result cannot be known for some time."

"What good, then, Alexander, have you done by coming here?"

Greville couldn't tell. He pouted his lips and opened his eyes very widely, but made no reply.

"One question more, Alexander, and I have done—do things remain as they were?"

"Precisely."

"That's sufficient. Heaven help the woman whose brother is a fool!"

That was harsh—very harsh. Greville felt it to be so as she impatiently bounced from the room. But he was not, therefore, angry: no, these cold, selfish minds are not easily disturbed from the point. He could also then be blamed. He didn't blame her. He pitied her, certainly, and quitted the house in a state of mind not exactly enviable before she was with Darnley

"Mr. Darnley," she observed, as she entered the room in which he was laughing very merrily indeed, "Mr. Darnley, I have one important question to ask you. A question to which my brother, it appears, can give no definitive answer, it is this: do you or do you not intend, sir, to perform your solemn promises with respect to your settlement?"

"My dearest love! what do you mean?"

"I beg, sir, that I may not be sneered at: you perfectly well know what I mean."

"Explain yourself, my dear, and be tranquil."

"I am tranquil—perfectly tranquil. All I wish to know is, whether you mean to perform your promise or not."

"My grand promise, dearest, I have performed. I promised to marry you!—have I not done so?"

"You have; but what was your object in marrying me?"

"What was your object in marrying me, my dear?"

"Sir "

"Oh! I'll answer for you. It was to be revenged on Lady Cleveland, my love!"

"It is false!"

"Use better language, my sweetest angel, or without any ceremony I'll turn you out of the house. It was to be revenged on Lady Cleveland! And now I'll tell you why I married you. I married you, my loveliest, solely because I conceived you to be rich, and if you imagined for one moment that I married you for any other purpose, you were a fool. I am candid, you perceive, my most beautiful girl—oh, most candid—as candid as you wished to appear my own darling before our happy marriage took place."

"Ah, curse, sir! —a base, hypocritical brute "

"Better language, my loveliest! you will use better language if you wish to remain here. The fact is, my sweet girl, we were both very selfish, but it happened that you were not quite artful enough: —that, my love, is the secret. As far as this settlement is concerned, you should not have been quite so much hasty in what you did. You ought to have had it completed, my sweetest, before our connubial felicity commenced. But your passion for me was so excessively ardent, and mine for you was so intolerably strong, that really delay was out of the question altogether."

"Are you not a vile wretch? Answer me that!"

"Old woman, answer me that—"

"Heartless creature! I will not endure it!"

"Be calm—but, be calm! Answer this—Did you for a moment imagine that I could have the slightest love for you?"

"Did you not endeavour to make me believe that you had?"

"That was my game: But did you believe it?"

"I did."

"Gods! at what age is a woman free from vanity!"

"I will not be thus insulted."

"You have your remedy, my darling! You can leave my house whenever you think proper!"

"Your house, wretch!"

"My sweet girl: you will remember that I have said—more than once!—that I shall turn you out unless you use somewhat more elegant language. I have, however, no more time, darling, to waste with you now; but I beg of you to recollect that, and be cautious. Adieu, dear.—Adieu, my beauty."

He then, with aloud laugh, left her in tears, and she felt that her fate was irrevocably sealed. What was she to do? What could she do? It was folly to say that she would not submit to be thus deprived of all that had possessed, inasmuch as she had placed herself entirely at his mercy. Still, feeling it to be utterly impossible for her to continue to live with so brutal a person, she rejoiced in the prospect of his being prevailed upon at least to sign a deed of separation.

In a few days, however, such a deed became unnecessary—quite!—for, assuming a tone of comparative kindness, he took her down to Cheltenham, where—as he came up immediately on business of great importance—he left her; and there she remained until her letters were opened by the post-office authorities, and returned, when she hastened back to London, and found to her horror that the house had been cleared, and was then to be let.

EXPENSES OF THE LAW.

The case of Ranger v. the Great Western Railway Company involved upon the question of amount almost as important results as were embraced in the great case of Small and Attwood. The latter was able to lay before our readers some of its statistics. The first bill was 812 folios, the amended bill 1157. The first supplemental suit bill 941 folios, the second supplement suit bill 525 folios. The first answer 1999 folios, the second 123 folios, the third 319 folios. The documents admitted upwards of 800 folios. The plaintiff's evidence 1865 folios; the defendant's, 405 folios. Total of folios upwards of 6736, for which an office copy charge was made of 10*l.* per folio, besides voluminous affidavits. Short-hand notes on collateral arguments, 2200 folios. Observations, 30 brief sheets. The total brief, embracing these copies, for counsel, would be nearly 950 brief sheets. Sir Wm. Follett's fee was 300 guineas, and 100 additional, with twenty other fees, making £500. Mr. Stuart had 220 guineas, and 100 additional; Mr. Richards 220 guineas; Mr. Stevens 150 guineas, and 50 additional. In the early stage of the cause the counsel had fees as follows: First counsel, 150 guineas; second do., 105 guineas; third ditto, £80; besides numerous other smaller fees; making a total in counsel's fees alone, of nearly £3000. The Vice-Chancellor has already ordered the plaintiff to pay a great part of the costs of these matters! The case was five years in progress, and the same solicitors were for the company that were engaged in Small and Attwood, namely—Messrs. Swain, Stevens, and Co., Freshfields, London. The short-hand writers' bills remained to nearly £400! Thus it will be seen that going to "law" is a rather expensive amusement.

A NOVEMBER NIGHT.

It was night—a night in Autumn, cold, raw, dreary, dark, and rainy, although the very night which closed in upon so calm a day as we have described in our last chapter—a true emblem of human life—the uncertain calm and the sudden tempest, mingled in such a manner, in which no eye can decipher where they begin, or where they end, for the smiles and the tears of the season drop from the self-same sky: it is still the face of heaven, whether seen in sunlight, or in storm. A bitter cold wind blew from the north-east. These cold, nipping winds, which always usher summer of every remnant of faded beauty, and sends the yellow leaves by hosts into deep hollows, there to be rained upon and rotted; and, when winter comes, he finds the work of destruction ready to his hands, and moans, and blows, and roars over it, because nothing is left for him to destroy; so he whistles through the "looped and windowed raggedness" of miserable man. It was a night in the month of November, when London seems to feel perfectly wretched, afflicted with dense and heavy fog; while on it drives the rain and the wind, as if to wedge the heavy mass more closely together; when old hollow churchyard coughs call to each other across the streets, with a melancholy groaning, while asthmatical people wheeze and blow, as they walk along, with their mouths tied up, as if they breathed through an atmosphere of vitriol. It was that miserable month in which fashionables make up their minds to feel perfectly wretched, after they have returned from their favourite watering-places, or from a journey to the sweet, green country; when they feel dissatisfied with themselves, their shops, their homes, and their streets, to get into dark and gloomy corners, and poison themselves like rats; or hang themselves on old, decaying beams, with cold, damp, mouldy ropes; or, with rusty and forbidding-looking pistols, blow out their brains. When the Lord Mayor's show creeps slowly along through the drizzling atmosphere, or winds up the muddy and slippery streets, while the music falls upon the ear like the wailing tones of misery; and people sneeze and cough, stick up their shoulders, and thrust their hands, arms, noses, and knees, over and

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT.

The future historian of the reign of Victoria will have to devote a considerable space of his annals to the royal excursions of our youthful Sovereign. The pencils of our artists have been again called into requisition to illustrate her Majesty's "Progress" through one of the most interesting districts of the land she rules. It is not now the halls of the Chateau D'Eu, or the forest-shades of la belle France, through which the steps of royalty are conducted—but the residences of her own nobility—the halls of an old and wealthy aristocracy, of whose homage the most powerful monarch might be proud. Nor is this the only or even the chief feature of her Majesty's excursion. It makes her familiar with the outward appearance of that portion of her empire where are situated the great triumphs of our national energy, in the form of those vast manufacturing establishments which constitute the wonder of the world they almost supply. Another circumstance must press the magnitude of this system still more forcibly upon her; she sits a welcome and honoured guest at the table of her Prime Minister, sprung to birth from the manufacturing class, inheriting the wealth created by its skill, and who has won his way, by his own talents and perseverance, to the highest position of the most extensive empire of the world. The spectacle at Drayton Manor, during the last two days, is, in many respects, an impressive one. Sovereign and subject—monarch and minister—host and guest—how much is there in these relations to give rise to reflection! Others, too, were present at the splendid board—representatives of the noblest houses of the realm—the Talbots, the Rutlands, the Buccleuchs. To the mind that looks beyond the surface of things, the conventionalities of society are too apt to hide from us the real significance of many events—there would be summoned up associations of the present and the past—of the old feudalities of England—their absolutism perished, but their courtliness and magnificence remaining, blending with the wealth equally large, and the power far greater than they ever possessed—both fallen into the hands of a representative of the modern system of production and commerce—a thing which, compared with the traditions and annals of these ancient names, is but of yesterday. We recognise in such events an illustration of the great law of progress. All permanent changes are more or less gradual, and without the contrast which such events as these present to us, we should not be fully sensible of the vast alteration the constitution of society has undergone. There are some who regret those changes; who sigh over the past, and would fain restore it. But all such sympathies are as foolish as they are vain. The hand of the dial cannot be pushed back. The past had its crimes, its sufferings, and its miseries, as well as the present—though over much of them oblivion has happily let fall her veil. We may grieve over much that surrounds us now; but our exertions should be directed rather to the remedying of all that is evil, without wasting our time in vain regrets for forms and institutions that have vanished. Both for nations and individuals there is the stern sentence, "It is too late."

Repentance asks a spell in vain,
To call departed hours again.

But this is, perhaps, referring too much to an event, which to many will appear of an every-day character; we can only say, that we do not think with them.

Another remarkable feature of these "Progresses" of Royalty, is the uniform necessity we experience in finding a parallel for them, of resorting to the reign of Elizabeth—she "of the lion-port and eagle-eye." She never quitted the shores of England; the mutual jealousies of the monarchs of that age would scarcely have permitted it to be done in safety; but she mingled with her nobility, visited their residences, accepted their invitations, dined with her "loyal city," and honoured the feasts of her "royal merchant," Gresham, with her presence. He, too, was the child of a system which laid the foundation of that commercial enterprise that has produced the Arkwrights and Peels of the present day. He did not actually hold any office in the State, but he had great influence over the Court—an influence born of the "money-power" for the published facts of his life prove that he was almost the Rothschild of his age. It is also singular enough that, on the very same spot where our present Queen has been entertained by Sir R. Peel, Elizabeth was received by the Earl of Essex, her High Steward, who was then the possessor of Drayton.

But what a contrast is again presented to the mind's eye, in the state parade of the haughty and somewhat cold Elizabeth, when all the cumbrous splendour of her state could not disguise the rudeness of everything in the shape of personal accommodation, which no amount of wealth could then obviate or remove! The mail-like pace of the royal cavalcade, over roads, the best of which were almost impassable to wheel carriages, compared with the almost lightning swiftness of a royal transit now made, with all the appliances and means afforded by railroads and steam. Borne along by the imprisoned elements, which the skill of man has, as it were, harnessed and compelled to do his bidding, the royal carriage rushes past, scarcely seen by the expecting hundreds, ere it has sped out of sight. Does it not speak volumes of the universal confidence felt in these newly-developed powers, that the most important political personage in the land can trust them so unhesitatingly—nay, with a degree of pleasure—for we perceive that our gracious Queen avails herself of the Railway, on every occasion, in preference to the slower, and not safer method. Some who have permitted their fears rather to disturb their equanimity, have objected to the royal person encountering the perils they fancy are to be found on a railroad. But experience is fast proving them to be more timid than wise. Then the loyalty of the proprietors of these immense works has prompted them to do everything that skill and capital can accomplish to ensure safety, and to link speed with splendour. Read the description of the carriage constructed for her Majesty, by the London and Birmingham Company. Does it not look like a passage from some modern "Thousand and One Nights?" There is the very spirit of luxury and splendour in every line;

"The horse of brass,
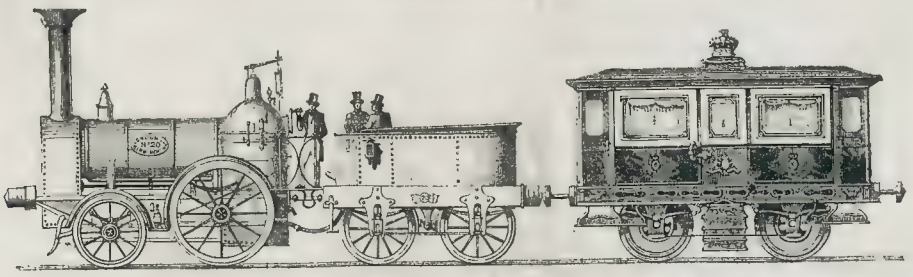
On which the Tartar King did ride," in the tale of Chaucer, had not the magic speed of this fairy car—thought be a thing of reality and not of imagination. It only requires the genius of a Shakspeare to breathe into the description of it the breath of immortal poetry, and it might, perhaps, live in song, a companion to the galley of Cleopatra, that bore the Egyptian Queen on her voyage to meet Marc Anthony. Is there no "coming man" who can do justice to such a subject?

It is almost superfluous to add, that everywhere her Majesty has been received by the hearty greetings of a loyal people. These journies have this good effect,—that they bring Royalty more in contact with the community; it may afford to thousands but a momentary glance, but that is sufficient to invest the monarch with a personal memory in the hearts of her subjects.—Once seen the Sovereign ceases to be an abstraction, and little as this may appear, it is still productive of good. Summer or winter—on sea or shore—we are equally rejoiced to find that her Majesty can derive pleasure from excursions that take her beyond the shades of the retirement of Windsor, splendid though that palatial residence of a long line of Kings may be.

We cannot conclude better than by giving the following particulars from the Times, of the royal visit to the vicinity of Tamworth:—"It may not be uninteresting to the general reader to state, that this is the first visit of a reigning sovereign to Tamworth and its neighbourhood since the days of Queen Elizabeth. In fact, Queen Victoria, with the exception of Elizabeth, is the first reigning Queen who has honoured Tamworth with her presence since the days of Ethelfleda, the daughter of Alfred. It is said, however, that James II. once visited Tamworth, and it is known that Henry of Richmond passed through Tamworth to the battle of Bosworth, where he was victorious against the Duke of Gloucester. Tamworth was, in fact, during the early ages of English history, the residence of our most powerful and warlike kings. It is not a little singular that the last visit of a Monarch Queen of these realms paid to Tamworth was when Elizabeth visited the Earl of Essex (then her High Steward) at the ancient manor of Drayton Bassett, where Sir R. Peel has now the distinguished honour of receiving and entertaining Queen Victoria."

INTERIOR OF THE ROYAL RAILWAY CARRIAGE.



THE ROYAL RAILWAY CARRIAGE, AND ENGINE.

THE ROYAL RAILWAY CARRIAGE

The carriage constructed for her Majesty's use, by the directors of the London and Birmingham Railway Company, is of a very superior description; and the elegance and convenience combined in the design have scarcely a parallel in the records of coach-building. The following are the details from the Morning Chronicle: "The carriage itself is of an oblong shape, the dimensions being about 15 feet by 7 feet, thus forming a handsome saloon, nearly 8 feet high in the clear. The finest mahogany has been used in its construction; and the body of the carriage is double panelled, and lined and stuffed with felt, in order to lessen the vibration and increase warmth. The carriage is divided externally into three compartments, formed by the door and panels on either side. The body rests upon a bed of the finest ash, a coating of India rubber, three-quarters of an inch thickness, being placed between, which has the effect of almost destroying the vibration generally attendant on railway carriages. At either end of the state saloon, and entirely unconnected with it, are small compartments, for each a guard, who has the control of a powerful argand lamp, which, on passing through the tunnels along the line, reflects a strong light through a ground-glass of globular form inserted in the panelling. The roof of the carriage projects six inches over the body, and rises in the form of a cupola towards the centre, where a ventilating apparatus is fixed, surmounted by a colossal gilt crown, which gives a striking finish to the exterior design. Anewly-invented spring has been adopted, one peculiarity attached to it being the insertion of a thin hoop of steel within a leather belt, which has the effect of increasing the power of tension in a very remarkable degree, and rendering the motion of the carriage perfectly easy. The wheels are of the best construction, having wooden felloes six inches deep, with strong iron centre-pieces, and the inconvenience arising from sudden concussion has been guarded against so far as possible by the finest description of buffer springs. The carriage is painted dark lake (the Queen's colour) relieved with scarlet and gold; the upper quarterings having a broad border of French white round the plate glass windows in either panel. These windows are three feet six inches wide, by two feet six inches high, and have a gilt beading round the exterior, with small gilt ornaments at each corner. The doors are quartered in ornamented with the heraldic devices of the royal family. The Queen's coat of arms is emblazoned on the door panel, and the insignia of the Order of the Garter occupy the centre of each side panel. The entrance is made by folding steps with four treads, covered with mo.occo

"The interior of the carriage is lined throughout with delicate blue satin, wadded and tufted, and the angles finished with broad fluted pilasters of the same elegant material. The lining of the windows are light elegant draperies of blue and white satin, tastefully finished with fringe. The cornices are of satinwood, lightly and exquisitely carved, and slightly relieved with gold. One extremity of the saloon is occupied by an elegant Paris settee, the same as the curtains. There are also two chairs finished in the same material, the satinwood frames of which are beautifully carved in the Louis Quatorze style. Two console tables and two encoignures in the same taste complete the furniture, with the exception of the carpet, which is Axminster, of suitable design, and the rich tones of which contrast advantageously with the delicate effect of the other furniture: in the centre of the design are the Royal Arms. It should also be mentioned that by an engenious arrangement of an elegant curtain, the saloon can be divided into two compartments at pleasure.

"The inconvenience arising from cold in the most carefully constructed railway carriage, where a long journey has to be performed in the winter season, suggested to the directors the necessity of having a warming apparatus in the bed of the carriage, and Mr. Perkins, the inventor of the steam gun, has accordingly fitted a very ingenious apparatus for the purpose of heating the carriage with hot water. It may be thus briefly described:—a coil of pipe placed near the under axle-tree, and supplied with water from a small cistern in the bed of the carriage, is kept heated by means of a lamp with four burners. This pipe is continued round the other axle-tree and back again; and the water becoming hot, the heat is communicated through a small brass grating in the floor, the temperature of the carriage being regulated by the ventilator above alluded to.

"The carriage has been built under the superintendence of Mr. Wright, the chief of the company's carriage department; and the interior has been fitted up by Messrs. Gilow, the eminent upholsterers of Oxford-street.

"Throughout Monday, the secretary's office was thronged by ladies and gentlemen, anxious to inspect the carriage, and through the obliging attention of Mr. Creed, and Mr. Long, his assistant secretary, many hundreds were permitted to do so."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, NOVEMBER 28.

Since my last, most important events have taken place in Spain, and were I writing of any other country, I should say, "Peace and tranquillity is restored;" but it is far different in that unhappy country—when least expected, indeed, when it is most wanted. Those who ought to rally around their Queen, and protect the throne and nation, are about to deluge the country in civil blood. A new ministry is formed, Barcelona has capitulated, but Narvaez is dissatisfied, and Cortina is at the head of an imposing hostile party. Be not therefore deceived; rest not the present apparent tranquillity of Spain as a pledge for the future, but wait, and that patiently, and be assured, or I am greatly mistaken, I shall have to write, and that ere long, fresh troubles on the other side of the Bidassoa. The new ministry is thus composed:—M. Olozaga, President of the Council and Foreign Affairs." Now who has ever heard of this gentleman as a diplomatist? He was an efficient Alcalde of Madrid, a poor ambassador at the court of the Tuileries, and since office for the first time. But M. Olozaga, although a young man, is very prudent, and has care fully abstained from taking any open part in the late insurrection. He intrigued against Espartero, and, aided by the Ultra Liberals and Moderates, drove him from Spain. He intrigued against Lopez and the Ultra Liberals, and succeeded in driving his friend Lopez from power, and occupying his place. The new Minister of Justice is M. Luzuriaga; the Home Department is confided to M. Domenech, the Exchequer to M. Santoro, Marine to Gaston, to M. Frias, and the War Department to General Serrano. The last appointment is, perhaps, the most important. He was the satellite, and is now the opposer of Narvaez, and it is said this gentleman that Christina is about to put in all intrigue; not that he dreads his capacity, but his popularity. The first step of Narvaez will be the entrance of Christina into Spain. He will bow to that the Queen Mother by her presence will greatly accommodate the Ultra Liberals, and cause serious difficulties to the new minister. Christina will, however, not leave Paris immediately. She waits the report of M. Bresson, the French Ambassador at Madrid, and is under his advice that I am confident is assured she will act. In the meantime, another person, well known as the first and most successful intriguer of the day, has too celebrated Prince de Carini, Lord of the Bedchamber to the King of Naples. He has rushed Bayonne, en route for Madrid, on a secret mission!

The cry of poverty is heard throughout Spain—the interest on the public debt cannot be paid—the government pensions are unpaid—the army is in want of food and clothing—and yet at the court and in the houses of many of the late refugees, luxury and prodigal expenditure is the order of the day. A private letter which I have before me says:—"No idea can be formed of the grandeur and luxury which presided at the royal reception given on the 21st, at the palace; the Queen and her sister were dressed in white satin robes, embroidered with gold, on these saudders they were no magnificent cloaks studded with diamonds, and their heads were literally covered with precious stones. The ladies Santa Cruz, Medina Celi, Villa Hermosa, d'Albi, Noblegas, Salvatierra, Abrantes, Miradores, and Altamira, were white satin dresses embroidered, some with silver and others with gold."

It will have been remarked that the late insurrections and political movements have produced few, if any, remarkable characters, either as diplomatists or orators, the only person generally praised for the manly and independent spirit in which he maintained his opinions, is the Marquis de Talmbet. This nobleman is the same person, who, under the name of Juan Florian, acquired a well-merited literary reputation in England and France

Barcelona capitulated on the 29th, on the same conditions as those granted to the insurgents of Sarragossa. On the 32nd the Queen's troops took possession of the town and installed new members of the municipal council. The insurgent junta, and many of their friends, embarked, the same day, on board the French steamers. Prim and Caballero de Rodas, and all the Volunteers and the National Guard delivered up 6500 muskets—tranquility was restored, and many of the emigrants were returning. The Captain-General, after publishing a rather contradictory proclamation, left Barcelona with six battalions of infantry, for Figueres intending to command personally the military operations against that fortress, with an imposing force, and plenty of provisions, continues to occupy the fort of Figueres. On the 33rd the Queen's deputation from Figueres waited on him, and solicited him not to fire on the town. His answer was laconic—"Let Prim quit you, and you are safe: as long as he remains you are in danger." The deputation then called on Prim, who declared that he would remain where he was. Firing now commenced on both sides. On the 17th the insurgents fired a salute with blank cartridge, in honour of the Queen's fête; and Prim, on his side, had the town il uminated. On the 32nd the firing continued. Prim, greatly exasperated against Amettler, who broke his parole after the capitulation of Sitges, has issued the following proclamation:—"All persons now in the Fort San Fernando, are declared traitors, for their crimes against the Queen and the State, and robbers, on account of their pillage and murders; and, as such, they shall undergo, when arrested, the penalties ordered by the law in such cases. The same punishment shall be applicable to those lending them support As soon as any rebels shall present themselves in the town, the inhabitants shall be bound to assemble at the sound of the tocsin, to exterminate them, under the pena tes mentioned above. Whoever shall be found within the line of blockade, shall be shot, unless bearing a safe conduct, signed by the Commander-in-Chief, or head of the staff. Spies, of every age, sex, or condition, shall be shot," &c. &c.

ITALY.

Letters from Naples, of a recent date, state, that daily conferences were held between the Minister for Foreign Affairs and the British Ambassador. At first, it was imagined that the object of these meetings was the conclusion of a treaty of commerce, almost so far advanced, and by which the British flag obtains a privilege of 10 per cent. above all other nations. On further inquiry, it transpired, that the Neapolitan Government was desirous that the Italian refugees should be driven from Malta. Since the late insurrection in the Papal States, all persons travelling from Malta or Marseilles for Italy, must only be provided with a regular passport, signed by their Ambassador, but, should they wish to reside, with a certificate of their moral character.

The 7th, the Duke d'Aumale, accompanied by all the Royal Family, was present at the Theatre San Carlos, at the representation of the opera, "Maria Padella," and the ballet, "Gerard de Nevers." The next day he passed the troops in review, and visited the environs of Naples. The 10th, the King and the Duke visited Pompeii, and the same afternoon, Sorrento and Castellamare. The 13th, the Duke left for Malta. It was generally reported at Naples, and much credited, that the Duke d'Aumale had made an offer and been accepted, as the future husband of the Princess Maria Theresa, sister of the King of the Two Sicilies.

GERMANY.

The last accounts from Leipsic, dated the 30th ult., state that two first rate mercantile houses in Bremen, Messrs. Heinzl and Co., and Messrs. Charles and Gustave Haskell, had equipped two vessels of 900 tons each, destined for China, and laden with German manufactured goods. The expedition, which sailed on the 19th ult., is accompanied by four young Leipsic mercantists, whose mission is to find out what German goods would suit the China market.

VIENNA, Nov. 15.—A report is current that Prince Leopold, the youngest son of the Duke of Saxe Coburg Kohalt, is to marry the young Queen of Spain. This report has gained credit in the higher circles.

FRANKFORT, Nov. 18.—A report in the Morning Advertiser states that the intention of the Duke of Bordeaux's visit to England is no other than that of organizing the scheme of a general insurrection of all French legitimists, to take place at the demise of Louis Philippe's death, an event that, by the course of nature, cannot be very far distant.

PORTUGAL.

Lord Aberdeen, in reply to a communication from some of the principal mercantile houses in the wine trade in the city, stated them, through his secretary, that he sees no hope of coming to an understanding with the Portuguese government, and that his lordship, therefore, considers the discussion on the subject of a mutual reduction of duties to be finally terminated.

FRANCE.

The Paris season will commence early this year. Many of our fashionables have already opened their salons. The meeting of the Houses of Parliament, fixed by royal ordinance for the 27th of December, will bring most of our principal families from their country seats.

The Legitimist journals are very angry with the Government for ordering Prince Poligniac to quit Paris without assigning to the public in general seem to care little whether the Prince remains or goes; indeed, the subject is hardly worth noticing.

The last sitting of the Council of the Admiralty was devoted to the budget of 1845. The number of sailing and steam vessels intended for sea had been fixed, for 1844, at—8 ships of the line, 12 frigates, 8 corvettes, 24 war brigs, 12 transport corvettes, 44 vessels of flotilla or transport, and 23 steamers; making a total of 140; to which were to be added, in ordinary, 12 ships of the line, and 4 frigates. The budget for 1845 has, however, been fixed as follows:—At sea: 8 ships of the line, 10 frigates, 12 war corvettes, 26 war brigs, 20 transport corvettes, 40 vessels of flotilla or transport, and 44 steamers. In Ordinary: 8 ships of the line, 8 frigates, 6 war corvettes, 2 transport corvettes, and 6 steamers

Last evening the Government published the following telegraphic despatch:—

"VIENNA, Nov. 21.—The Ambassador of France to the Minister for Foreign Affairs:—M. de Bourqueney writes to me from Constantinople, stating that the President of the Council of Justice, Rafic Effendi, was dismissed on the 8th, and replaced by Achmed-Fethi Pacha, brother-in-law of the Sultan.

"The Ottoman Ambassador to the other men-of-war stationed on the coast to protect the oyster beds, have ordered the steamer Alector, of 80 horse power, to be fitted out, and to join immediately the station of Granville.

The 23rd of November, at nine o'clock, an interesting comet was discovered by M. Faye, an astronomer attached to the Royal Observatory.

The Archbishop of Paris was only ordained in 1822, by a Bull from Pope Gregory XV., and dated the 8th of the Kalends of Julius, St. Denis, who was the first Bishop of Paris, to Henri de Gondy, who was the last, there had been 110 Bishops. From Jean François de Gondy, who was the first Archbishop, to M. Affre, the present Archbishop, there have been 16. The 66 convents present in Paris five religious seminaries. six convents for men, and thirty six convents for women.

The funeral of M. Dupin, the father of the celebrated M. Dupin, well known as the late President, Chamber of Deputies, and who died a few days since, took place on Saturday last at Clamecy. When arrived at the tomb, and the coffin was lowered into its last resting place, a most affecting scene took place. His three sons, all men of high reputation, mounted by its side, and having performed the last solemn office of sprinkling the earth with holy water, embraced each other, mingling their tears for their loss. Being an officer of the Legion of Honour and a Member of the Chamber of Deputies, he had a military funeral.

A grand dinner was given on Saturday last at the Chateau of St. Cloud, on the occasion of the 36th anniversary of the marriage of the King and Queen.

The cold weather has been more than usually severe in the Pyrenees. On the 10th, an officer garrisoned at Saint Jean Pied de Port, visited the neighbouring mountains on military service, accompanied by a Basque, as guide. Being absent longer than was expected, search parties were sent in. After crossing the mountains, the guide was found frozen to death, and the young officer nearly dead, in the hut of a Spanish peasant.

We are very barren of theatrical news this week; "Don Sebastian" continues to be played to overflowing houses at the Grand Opera; and "Maria de Rohan" is the grand attraction at the Italian Opera. It appears certain that Lablache will not return to Paris before the end of January, when he will sing for a few nights and frequently sings before the Royal Family. Lablache lately met with an accident which might have had a most serious result; his carriage upset, and his son Nicholas received some severe bruises.

On Sunday last Petipa and Carlotta Grisi made debût for the season at the Grand Opera in the ballet "La Peri." Their reception was most enthusiastic.

The Grand Musical Festival, given by the Musical Artist Association, is now definitively fixed for the 17th December.

The Concert Monstre, annually given at Vienna, took place on the 12th. The orchestra was composed of 1000 musicians. The "Creation" of Haydn was performed with remarkable precision. The audience was composed of 4000 persons. Patti is writing a new partition for the libretto of "La Jeune." Madame Dulci has fallen a victim to a bass baritone, and been obliged to quit the Theatre de la Scala.

GREECE.

His Majesty King Otho, on the proposition of his Ministers, has published a royal ordonnance, appointing M. A. Mavrocordato ambassador at the Ottoman Court, and M. J. Gennadius to take part in the deliberations and decisions of the Council of Ministers concerning the general interests of the state.

The Austrian and Bavarian Governments have replied to the notifications made to them of the entire willingness of the Greek people to accept the event as a fait accompli, and advise his Majesty to proceed with firmness in the constitutional road he has marked out for him.

TURKEY.

Recent intelligence has been received from Albania, by which it appears that the whole of the province is a prey to the most fearful anarchy. The Government, however, has at length taken decisive measures for the immediate and immediate suppression of these disorders. An army of 35,000 men has been concentrated, under the command of Reschid Pacha, the Roumeli Valesay, under whom Nizib Pacha and Omer Vrione, the Pachas of Albania, are Division. Another body of troops is now being assembled in Thessaly, for the purpose of forming a corps d'observation on the Greek frontier. Great uneasiness is experienced by the Government at the recent conduct of affairs in Greece.

The Rev. Dr. Wolff arrived at Constantinople on the 3rd ult., by the Iberia packet-steamer. He is only waiting for the necessary firmans and the arrival of Colonel Rigby, who has volunteered to accompany him, to prosecute his enterprising expedition to Bokhara.

Letters have arrived from Mosul, which state that the remnant of the Mountain Nestorians who had been driven to resist the Kurdish invaders, joined by their fugitive brethren, have gained a complete victory over their oppressors, and succeeded in regaining much of the territory they had lost.

EGYPT.

ALEXANDRIA, Nov 6.—About a week since we received the very important news of the death of Achmet Pacha, the late rebellious governor, said to be of imminent fever.

SYRIA.

BEYROUT, Oct. 1.—By the arrival of a courier here last night, we learn that disturbances of a very serious nature, resulting in loss of life, had broken out at Latachie, on the 5th instant, in which place the people had made an attack upon the Albanese, who were worsted, with the loss of thirty-eight killed, and seventeen wounded. The whole holy city has also been the seat of disturbance, as had been Nauplia and Tripoli.

NORTH AMERICA.

Mr. O'Connell is rising again into favour in the United States. A meeting to further Repeal, presided over by Colonel Johnson, had been held in the Tabernacle, in New York; and another meeting was held of still greater pretensions at the Park, when the news arrived out that he had been arrested, and was about to be prosecuted. There seems every prospect that the funds of the Corn Exchange will receive a considerable augmentation from the other side of the Atlantic, consequent upon the Government proceedings.

Intelligence from the Sandwich Islands states, that some difference had taken place between the King of the Sandwich Islands and Lord Paulet—that the former had been insulted, and that the British flag would be hauled down and that of the islands hoisted in its place.

The yellow fever at New Orleans, this year, has been very fatal. The Herald of that city publishes the names and addresses of 602 persons, natives of England, Ireland, Scotland, and Germany, who have fallen by its ravages, exclusive of 132 persons unknown. The Irish and Germans appear to have been the greatest sufferers.

By the arrival of the Britannia steamer, which reached Liverpool at eight o'clock on Thursday morning, we have received intelligence from New York, to the 15th ult.

In the United States little has occurred worthy of note. There has been a rumour of difficulties in the Cabinet at Washington, on the subject of the annexation of Texas to the United States, which it is now understood is to be proposed in the next Message of President Tyler.

The session in the State of New York for members of the Assembly has terminated in favour of the democrats by a majority little varying from the governor's vote of last year.

The harvest had not only been excellent in Canada generally this year, but it had been very good in Canada east, where, for the nine preceding years, the wheat had been almost entirely destroyed by the ravages of the fly. The belief in the colony is, that the imports of grain and flour into England next year will be very large.

Mr. Webster had made another speech at Andover, in which, among other things, he recapitulates his anti-repudiation doctrines avowed with so much strength at Rochester.

From Canada we learn that the decision of the seat of Government question and its result are the prominent items of Canadian news. The subject came up in the House of Assembly on motion of Mr. Baldwin, Nov. 3, and was finally disposed of in favour of Montreal by a vote of 51 to 27. The resolutions to that effect were sent up to the council and concurred in. A committee, consisting of Messrs. Baldwin, Lafontaine, and Stuart, and Sherwin, was appointed to draft an address to her Majesty embodying the foregoing resolutions.

The Hon. George Moffatt, member of the House of Assembly from Montreal, has resigned in consequence of not being able to comply with the instructions of his constituents requesting him to vote for the removal of the seat of Government to Montreal.

The question of Texas and Oregon, we have no doubt there will be a great excitement in Congress and perchance a new division of parties throughout the country. No one can predict the result.

SOUTH AMERICA.

The Brazilian Minister at Monte Video had directed the Imperial Naval Commander to withhold the recognition of the Argentine blockade of that port till the arrival of fresh instructions from the Court at Rio de Janeiro

By a published official bulletin a heavy affair appears to have taken place on the 19th of September, in front of Monte Video, when the Riveristas, 1000 in number, are said to have been severely repulsed. Rivera had, it is said, crossed the Ke, and was proceeding by the Colonia, pursued by General Urquiza.

The Consul General of France at Monte Video had posted up at his office a notice requiring all Frenchmen to withdraw from taking part in the struggle going on at Monte Video, and to maintain such a strict neutrality as the French Government itself wished to maintain Mexico and Yucatan cannot arrange their differences harmoniously, and there seems a prospect of the revival of that unconvening kind of warfare in which the mother and the daughter have been, more or less, engaged for years past.

PERU.—We have received the important intelligence that an English vessel sailed the 13th of August from Peruvian Government at Lima, for stealing guano off the rocks on the coast. The crew made some resistance, and the captain was shot in the shoulder. The vessel is of course a prize. The English have a powerful official bulletin on the 14th of August. Bolivia had threatened war against Peru. A formal declaration was daily expected. The ports of Cobija and Arica were under blockade to prevent the importation of gunpowder from Chile or Bolivia. A slight outbreak of a revolutionary tendency occurred recently in South Peru, with the ex-President Torrices at its head. The acting President, Vivanco, immediately sent a military force from Lima, by the English steamer Peruvian, and, after a short skirmish, routed the revolutionists.

There is a rumour, which seems pretty well accredited, that the varied disputes with Mexico, both on commercial points and in reference to the affair of the flag, have been settled by our government and the representative of the Republic in London.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE

By the ship Orestes, arrived at New Romney, Cape of Good Hope papers of the 30th September have been received, being four days later than the previous advices. The accounts from Natal may be considered decisive for the present, as they announce that a final treaty with the Boers if nothing fresh occurs to interrupt the harmony. The 200 men sent to reinforce Major Smith had arrived in safety, and that discreet and enterprising officer had taken his measures accordingly. Commandant Cloete and Major Smith to join him at Peterminutzburgh, with 25 men from the garrison at Natal, but this course of proceeding the latter disapproved of, as not likely to answer the end in view. Instead of marching a small detachment to the head quarters of the Boers, which he naturally conceived would only betray weakness, he moved the whole of his force, amounting to 300 men, and this step appears to have fully succeeded in overawing the refractory Boers, and reducing their farmers. The result is, that the terms have been generally acquiesced in by the Boers.

The restrictions heretofore placed upon the trade of Natal, have been entirely removed, and the ports of that colony now thrown open, and placed upon the footing of a separate British possession in every respect.

COUNTRY NEWS.

ASHTON.—The turn-out amongst the weavers at Ashton, which was commenced by the hands of Messrs. Reyner, of that place, has become general, and has extended to the weavers of Duckinfield and Hurst, as well as to those of Ashton. The turn-out has, however, not taken place as yet for Messrs. Reyner having opened their weaving shops, and offered to take any weavers who were willing to work at the old rate of wages, about one hundred and fifty offered themselves.

CHESHIRE.—ANOTHER ROBBERY.—On Saturday, as Mary Information was received that the parish church of Bowden, in Cheshire, was broken into on the night of the 21st instant, and the following property stolen, viz, a crimson velvet communion table-cover, with fringe, a silver chalice, dated, and stained with wine, a fine linen surplice, two silk hoods, four large prayer books, labelled with gilt letters, "Bowden, Churchwardens' Pew," and various other things. The churchwardens have offered a reward of £10 for the discovery of the delinquents thereof.

DOVER.—In the course of Tuesday, in consequence, it is supposed, of the late heavy showers of rain, an immense fall of chalk took place at the bottom of the cliff on the south side of the Admiralty Pier, which has for the present completely blocked up the entrance thereof, and will occasion great expense, loss of time and labour, to remove.

The works of the South Eastern line between Folkestone and Dover are progressing very rapidly towards completion, and we understand that arrangements are in progress for the establishment of efficient steamers to keep up a constant and regular communication with the French coast. In addition to the Boulogne boats, which have only been established since the imperfect opening of the Dover line, other French ports are arranging for steamers.

DARING HIGHWAY ROBBERY.—Last Saturday, as Mr. Hutchinson, bailiff to J. Kuder, Esq., of Saundridge, near Bury, was proceeding along the road, in his gig, he was stopped by four men, who were disguised, who cut the reins from his horse, and then rifled Mr. Hutchinson's pockets, and stole a leather pocket-book and three sovereigns

BRIDGETON.—THE LATE STORM.—Fragments of the wrecks which lately took place at Worthing and other places off the Sussex coast are daily coming ashore. On Saturday scores of fishermen lined the shores during the flow and ebb of the day tide, intent upon securing the pieces of plank which the waves washed on the beach; and many of the fishermen possessed of a goodly pile of the wood

DEVONPORT.—DEPLORABLE ACCIDENT.—Commander Douglas, who lately paid off the Tweed, 20, corvette, from North America, was about to proceed to Brighton on Tuesday morning, by steam, when he unfortunately walked over Plymouth pier, near the Breakwater, and although Quakers out of the water alive, we are sorry to hear the gallant officer expired a short time after.

Mr. Newman, one of the surgeons of the Wells Union, has been dismissed from his office by the poor law commissioners for practising homœopathy among the sick poor confided to his care. The commissioners previously obtained the opinion of the College of Physicians that a person practising homœopathy exclusively is unfit to act as a medical officer of a union.

LICHESTER.—APPREHENSION OF ROBBERS.—Considerable excitement has prevailed in the neighbourhood of Hichester, by the accidental discovery of several robberies which have taken place in the immediate locality of Hamster The dwelling-house of F. H. Dickenson, Esq., M.P., of Kingweston, and others, have been broken open, and robbed of guns, meat, cloth, &c. The following persons were apprehended, charged with committing the robberies:—Thomas Corry, H. Cullford, jun., H. Cullford, jun., George Cullford, John Walter, and Jones Palmer.

CLEOBURY.—On the morning of Thursday last, a fire took place in Primrose Mill, Oldham, the property of Mr. John Lees. The entire damage to the buildings and machinery may amount to upwards of £5,000. This unfortunate event will throw about 80 hands out of employment. The conflagration was wholly accidental.

WINTER ASSIZES.—It has been at length arranged that there shall be a winter assize for those portions of the Home Circuit where it is considered necessary on account of the state of the calendars, and Mr. Justice Cresswell has been appointed to go on the circuit. The following days have been appointed:—For the county of Essex, at Chelmsford, on Saturday, the 9th December; for the county of Kent at Maidstone, on Wednesday, the 13th of December; and for the county of Sussex, at Lewes, on Saturday, the 16th of December. Another learned judge, besides Mr. Justice Cresswell, has been named in the commission; but it is at present understood that that learned judge will not attend the circuit, unless pressure of business makes the presence of another judge necessary. The Western Circuit is fixed at Southampton, on the 20th of December, at Winchester; Devonshire, on the 27th of December, at Exeter; and Mr. Justice Creswell has been appointed to go on the circuit. The following days have been appointed:—For the county of Kent at Maidstone, on Monday, the 11th December; Hertfordshire, on Monday, the 18th December; Derby, on Wednesday, the 20th of December. The time for holding the assizes at York has not yet been decided on.

INCENDIARY FIRES.—On Wednesday evening a rick of wheat straw, standing in the village of Great Barford, Beds, the property of Mr. Wiliam Pedley, baker and coal merchant, was maliciously set on fire and entirely consumed. A most destructive fire took place last Monday at Stotfold, Bedfordshire, by which property to a large amount, belonging to Mr. Bryant Gibbons, has been destroyed. The whole of the farm buildings, excepting the house, were consumed, together with a large amount of agricultural produce. The total loss is estimated at about £4000. The whole stock was insured. There is no clue to the incendiaries. On Thursday se'nnight, between two and three o'clock, a fire was discovered at the farm homestead, in the occupation of Mr. George Swannel, adjoining Felmersham churchyard, Bedfordshire. The whole of the farmbuildings, and also two cottages (originally the farmhouse), in the occupation of labourers in the employ of Mr. Swannell, were entirely consumed, with some corn in the barn, and a quantity of straw, a portion of the latter being the property of the labourers. The amount of loss has not yet been ascertained, or what part of the property is insured, but there is no doubt of the fire being occasioned by the diabolical act of an incendiary.

REJOICINGS IN NOTTINGHAM ON THE VISIT OF HER MAJESTY.—The visit of a reigning sovereign to Nottingham cannot but be an event of great importance to the place and to the whole island, and so greatly anticipated from court sights. In the memory of the oldest inhabitant the reigning Sovereign has never before visited Nottingham. The Queen Dowager, after the death of her husband, passed through, by railway, to Sudbury, amidst the greatest rejoicing; and the Duke of Sussex, many years ago, dined with the Freemasons at Nottingham, while on a visit to Newstead Abbey; but Nottingham has not before been honoured by regnant royalty. Her Majesty will reach Nottingham at half-past eleven, and, in the station-yard, will be received by the Mayor (William Vickers, Esq.), and the Corporation, with an address. The station-yard is capable of holding 600 persons, and tenders to that number are to be issued at one guinea each, to allow of the inhabitants obtaining a view of her Majesty. On leaving the station, her Majesty will pass along the new road, on each side of which booths are to be erected and stalls built, so as to have the appearance of a regular fair. On the Trent bridge a triumphal arch is intended to be erected by the crew of the "Nautilus." A grand dinner at night, in the Exchange-hall, at which all seats and grades of party are to be present, will close the eventful day.

ANTI-CORN-LAW MEETING, AT ROCHDALE.—A very numerous meeting of the friends of free-trade in Rochdale and the neighbourhood, was held on Tuesday evening in the theatre, for the purpose of making a demonstration in aid of the great Anti Corn law League Fund of £100,000., by following the example set in the Manchester Town-hall, the other day. The Meeting was addressed by Mr Cobden, M.P., Mr Bright, M.P., and the Rev. W. J. Fox.

STATE OF SOUTH WALES.—ABERYSTWITH, Nov. 25.—The Special Commissioners arrived here on Saturday night, and commenced their inquiry in the morning at the Belle Vue Hotel. The Commissioners are to leave Aberystwith on Tuesday, for Rhyader, in Radnorshire, the scene of the recent "Rebecca" riots, and then to return into some portion of Carmarthenshire.

SHREWSBURY.—The excessive and continuous rains in this county and in Montgomeryshire produced on Wednesday a sudden rush of water from the Severn into the houses of the suburbs of Shrewsbury, especially in Frankwell. Considerable losses have been suffered. Twenty-seven sheep, belonging to Mr. Owen of Nesscliffe, were drowned. In Melverley, &c. the losses are considerable. As a proof of the sudden rush of the flood, it may be mentioned that a book, weighing nine pounds and a half, was thrown suddenly upon land near Pentesford Bridge, and could not escape to its element, but was captured. The rush of water at this place is always sudden and evanescent. Here it was that many lives and property were lost at the calamitous flood in the year 1811.

IRELAND.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

THE QUEEN v. O'CONNELL AND OTHERS.

On Saturday's list, Mr. O'Hagan, of counsel for C. G. Duffy, one of the defendants in the above case, applied to the Court, soon after it sat, to order that either the defendant or his solicitor should be furnished with the names of the witnesses endorsed on the indictment, or for such other order as the Court might be pleased to make. The application was grounded on the copy of the indictment furnished to the defendant pursuant to the order of the court, on the affidavit of his attorney, and also on the affidavit made by James Coppock, sworn on the 20th inst. The affidavit of the traverser's solicitor stated the copy of the indictment furnished to the defendant by the clerk of the Crown did not contain the names of the witnesses on whose evidence it was found, or the names of those sent before the Grand Jury; and he also deposed that the names on the back of the indictment were necessary for the defence of his client. The affidavit of Mr. Coppock was to the effect that he is an attorney of her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench in England; and that he is well acquainted with the practice of the courts of law there, of the Crown-office, and of the Court of Queen's Bench, with reference to indictments for conspiracy and misdemeanours; and he stated that, of his own knowledge, he could depose that in cases of indictment for conspiracies or misdemeanours, an office copy of every indictment supplied by the Crown to any one applying for it contained the caption, and the names of the witnesses examined before the Grand Jury.

The Attorney-General opposed the motion, and contended that at no period in Ireland had such an application been complied with.

Mr. Whiteside, in support of the motion, said that the traversers did not ask for the addresses, but merely the names of the witnesses; and he trusted that the Judges of the Queen's Bench would not make themselves the expositors of stating that to be the law which was not the law in the towards the lobby, which encloses the arena, and are called the Tendres Patios, the favourite resort of the populace, and not a vagabond in Madrid who can muster the two reals, either by stealing or starvation, would be absent.

There may be seen the red-capped Catalan; the Valencian, with his blanket and airy bragas; the Montera cap of the Manchego; the leathern cuirassed Old Castilian; the trunk-hose of Leone; the round hat and embroidered finery of Andalusia, mingling with the Capa Pardi of the mags, each in and out of turn bellowing, whistling, and shouting during the interludes, giving a bustle and character to the whole scene.

The portion of the Plaza allotted to the bulls, horses, and torreros, is of very simple construction. The arena is enclosed by a barrier of four or five feet high, surrounded by a circular lobby, into which the combatants escape when too hotly pursued. This lobby is pierced by four sets of folding doors, communicating from the arena to the different departments beneath. One of these is the toril, where the bulls are enclosed preparatory to the combat; another gives admittance to the alguazils; a third to the horses and picadors; whilst through a fourth the carcasses of the victims are dragged.

On taking your place in the amphitheatre, you are instantly struck with the picturesque scene which immediately bursts upon you. The crowded boxes above, the glittering costumes beneath, the sparkling sand in the arena glistening beneath the sun, and rendering gloomier and more sombre the shaded side of the area. The hour appointed for the commencement of the feast having at length arrived, the corregidor takes his seat, supported by his officers. A priest also remains in waiting, with the Host, ready to administer the sacrament to the dying toreros The trumpets sound, the gates beneath the royal box are thrown open and two alguazils enter the lists, mounted on Andalusian steeds. These alguazils have their black wands of office, and are dressed in the ancient Spanish costume. Having rode round the lists to clear them of the populace, they make an obeisance to the corregidor, who upon this throws down the key of the toril, waves his handkerchief, and the music immediately sounds a march. The folding doors are thrown open, and the chulos enter, escorting the picadors. Hootings and bravos, according as these are in popular favour, welcome their entrance into the arena.

The doors by which the bull enters are opened, and a young toro bounds into the arena:—

From Guadiana comes he not, he comes not from Xenil,
From Guadalarji of the Rain, or Narves of the Hill;
But where from out the forest bursts Xorama's watery clear,
Beneath the oak trees was he nursed, this proud and stately steer.

Dark is his hide on either side; but the blood without doth boil,
And the dun hide glows as if on fire, as he paws to the turmoil.
His eyes are jet, and they are set in crystal rings of snow;
But now they stare, with one red glare of brass upon the foe.

Upon the forehead of the bull the horns stand close and near,
From out the bone and sprinkled skull like daggers they appear.
His neck is massy, like the trunk of some old knotted tree,
Whereon the monster's shagged mane like billows curled ye see.

His legs are short, his hams are thick, his hoofs are black as night,
Like a strong flail, he holds his tail in fierceness of his might.
Like something molten out of iron, or hewn from out the rock,
Harpado of Xorama stands to bide the Alcaydes shock.

Moorish Ballad.

Coming forward in mad career—his tail writhing furiously, his head down, mouth foaming, nostrils open and fiery, with glaring eyes through the matted curls of his forehead—he giances his bewildered eye around the arena, and is attracted by the chulos, fluttering their gay cloaks; he makes for the nearest at his utmost speed.

The chulo, warmly pursued, waves his crimson cloak to the right and left; he reaches the barrier without being overtaken, and leaps over it into the lobby. Foiled in the chulo, the bull now makes for the picador, who is seen drawn up at a short distance from the barrier, with his lance grasped tightly in his right hand and under his arm. The bull pauses to eye his antagonist, drops his head and covers it with his horns, and, shutting his eyes, darts upon his enemy. The bull is, perhaps, turned aside by the lance of the picador. The horse—who perhaps is frightened or injured by this encounter—turns to escape, but is instantly overtaken by the harpado, who, driving his horns into his flank, overturns both horse and rider.

He darts upon the fallen picador entangled in his saddle. The anxiety of the multitude is now at its height. The men rise from the benches—the women cross themselves. The chulos come up with their cloaks and entice the bull to another part of the arena. The fallen man is raised from the dust, wounded, dying, or dead—another picador, and another, is served perhaps in the same manner. Perhaps he clears the list—the horses, limping out of the arena if able, dragging their bowels on the ground and trampling upon them with their feet. The bravery of the bull if brought fatal to the life of more than one victim, can never avail to save his own; in this the laws of the Plaza are inexorable. Some famous bandarillero, or matador, now enters the arena. The Lopez del Yllo, the Antonio Gravina, a Montes—or a Romero—either with bandarillos, or a sword and hay. He approaches the box of the corregido, he takes off his hat and makes a low obeisance, returns the salutations which greets him from the circus. Throws away his hat.

The trumpets give a signal for a change. The bull is now to be assailed. Some of the chulos have laid aside their banners or cloaks, and have armed themselves with banderillos, which are light darts, about seven or eight inches in length, having a barbed point, and are adorned with light paper and coloured ribbons. Should the bull be a cowardly one, these are filled with crackers or touch paper, and set light to.

The banderillo now places himself before the bull, enticing him forwards, directing the darts in each side of his neck, allowing the horns of the bull to pass under his right arm. As these darts are inserted into his neck, a shout of applause rings round the arena. The hero turns and makes for the palisades for shelter, whilst the bull, maddened by the continued incision of these darts, inserted by the various heroes of the arena, bounds round the arena, dashing his tail, and, bellowing lustily, stretches his limbs to ease them from the tightness of the costume and uncovers his toledo. The chulos are engaged all this while in exciting the bull—enticing him to the spot where the matador awaits him; then holding out the banner, allows the animal to rush against it—the sword is poised. The multitude rise upon the benches—all eyes are bent upon the glittering weapon; the bull rushes on—the flag gives way—his horns pass closely beneath the extended arm of the matador, but the sword is no longer seen—it has entered the shoulder of the bull up to the hilt.

Francisco Montes used to perform this feat sitting upon a chair in the middle of the Plaza, and the renowned Portuguese Antonio Gravina mounted on stilts. Should the bull have received the death blow, he flies, bellowing, to the extremity of the arena, and there falls and dies; otherwise he is humstrung, or a short dagger is struck into his spine.

Three or four toros are thus served. On the death of each, three mules rush in harnessed abreast, and covered with bells, flags, and feathers; their driver places a strap round the horns or body of the dead bull. The team is lashed into a gallop. The dust and sand curls round the carcass of the harpado, and a trail of blood is left alone upon the sand. The trumpets announce the end of the foray.

A young bull embalado whose horns covered with bells, enters the arena. The tag-rag—the aspirants to bull fighting honours—the mags, now rush from the amphitheatre down upon the Plaza. The bull is baited and bulled. Sometimes an unlucky wight is tossed and trampled to death. Sometimes the glittering tassels of a Madrid dandy is torn to atoms, and the horns of the infuriated animal are decked with three or four different species of garments, to the great amusement of the spectators. This scene continues for the remaining part of the afternoon. The spectators gradually disperse, and the talk of the Prado in the evening is generally of the valientes of the morning's fight.

PICADORES.

The picadores wear Moorish jackets embroidered with gold; large flat white hats, which are kept on the head by a string passing round the chin; buckskin trousers lined with plated armour, and heavy Andalusian boots. Their lance is long, with a small three cornered steel point, which is wound round with yarn to prevent it from penetrating far—and serves more for a defensive weapon than an offensive one—mounted on a Moorish saddle which rises before and behind, near a foot from the back, in order to strengthen the seat of the rider. The attire of the picador is usually soiled by his frequent tumbles.

CHULOS.

The chulos—or, literally speaking, merry-andrews—as well as the matadors and banderilleros, are dressed in the costume of the majos, which is the gala costume of Andalusia. Their long hair is combed backwards, and plaited with ribbons. The whiskers are trimmed into the true Andalusian curve. A shirt, richly worked at the breast; a velvet jacket, too narrow to reach at the front, trimmed at the lappels and cuffs with abundance of gold lutrons and filagree work; under this, a vest, embroidered in the same style; a scarf of glittering silk round the neck; small-clothes, of the same or parti-coloured velvet, studded with buttons, from the head to the knee; white silk stockings, and pumps; handkerchiefs floating from each pocket (the majos pride themselves particularly on both the quantity and quality of their handkerchiefs); and a silk cloak, of green, yellow, or red, which they use to irritate and entice the bull with.

TOMBS OF CHARLES THE BOLD AND HIS DAUGHTER, AT BRUGES.

TOMBS OF CHARLES THE BOLD, AND HIS DAUGHTER, AT BRUGES.

These interesting works of middle age art rank high among the curiosities of the ancient city of Bruges; they were inspected and much admired by Her Majesty and Prince Albert, during their recent visit to Belgium.

The tombs are placed in a side chapel in one of the aisles of the church of Notre Dame. They were raised, or rather wrought, to the memory of Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, and his daughter Mary, wife of the Emperor Maximilian—the last scions of the house of Burgundy, and the last native sovereigns of the Netherlands. The effigies of both father and daughter, made of copper richly gilt, but not displaying any high excellence as works of art repose at full length on slabs of black marble. Beneath and round the sides are coats of arms, richly enamelled, "which record the string of duchies, counties, and lordships which this illustrious and amiable heiress brought to the house of Austria, and which afterwards swelled the empire, on which the sun never set, of her grandson Charles V. The exquisite richness of the monuments, their historical interest attaching both to the father and daughter, and the affection of the Flemish for the memory of this young Countess, who died when pregnant at the age of twenty five, by a fall from her horse, while hawking with her husband near Bruges, having long concealed, out of affection for him, the mortal injury she had received, render these objects worthy of considerable attention." The Duke wears a crown on his head, and is decorated with the order of the Golden Fleece.

The monument of Mary of Burgundy was erected in 1495. In 1568, Philip II. bespoke one exactly like it for his great-great grandfather, Charles the Bold, and paid one Master Jooghelinck for it 14,000 florins, besides 40 florins to each of the workmen as compensation for the loss of his teeth in the process of enamelling. During the French Revolution, these monuments were concealed, to prevent them from the rapacity of Vandalism, by the beadle of the church, at the peril of his life, at a price of 2000f. was put upon his head in consequence of this good deed. They are now usually covered up with care, but they are shown for a small fee.

INTERIOR OF LUTON CHAPEL.

LUTON CHAPEL.

In Mr. Shaw's splendid work, illustrative of the chapel destroyed in the late fire at Luton Hoo, fortunately a memorial of the above superb specimen of ecclesiastical architecture will be preserved for the student of the fine arts, and the lover of our national antiquities. From this valuable source we present our readers with the annexed perspective view of the chapel, looking towards the altar, which shows the most perfect picture of its elaborate beauty capable of representation in a single engraving.

The Luton Chapel was of the latest and most florid period of Gothic architecture; displaying in the forms of some of its arches and mouldings a mixture of the Roman, which was coming into fashion at the period of its construction, and which afterwards degenerated into the grotesque style prevalent during the reigns of Elizabeth and James. It consisted of such an endless variety of ornaments and embellishments, when considered in the detail, as to induce a person at first sight to imagine that the several parts of it must have been constructed at very different periods; but it would, perhaps, have been admitted, on a more accurate examination, that the whole must have emanated from one grand and consummate design. There was, indeed, a complete uniformity in the relative parts, conducive to one great end and productive of one general effect. The whole of the interior presented a rich display of panel work, beautifully carved in oak, and ornamented by an assemblage of elegant cornices, embattlements, niches, canopies, crockets, and finials, having the usual accompaniments of stalls, seats and misereres, as in the choirs of our cathedrals; with a splendid pulpit and desk of tabernacle-work, surmounted by a gorgeous canopy, which was carried by several gradually diminishing stages, to the height of more than 16 feet from the floor. At the upper end was an altar-screen, consisting of two tiers of solid arch-work, divided by a bold fascia, charged with oak-leaves, vine-leaves, roses, lilies, and thistles, each containing ten niches, with perks for the reception of statues, and having their recesses finished with the most florid and fanciful tracery, of which a similar example will not easily be found in this country. There was also an altar in the highest state of preservation, which Mr. Shaw tells us, was the most complete, if not the only specimen remaining of those numerous altars in our churches and monasteries, which were so indignantly destroyed in general, either by the Reformers of the sixteenth, or the Puritans of the seventeenth century. From the inscriptions it appeared to have been the principal altar, framed after the model of the Ark of the Covenant, under the Jewish theocracy; the little loops or rings of wire still remained, on which were suspended the "cortina bombycina," or curtains of silk, which veiled from vulgar gaze the emblem of the great mystery of Holiness. Like its sacred prototype, it was of portable size, being about three feet high from its base, hollow, and pierced with open-work at the sides, to make it light and more elegant; and, when the curtain was drawn aside, admitting a partial view of the relics and sacred treasures enclosed. We shall find by a reference to history, that such altars were actually carried in procession on solemn occasions. They were also made hollow and of a square form, in accordance with the express direction contained in the 27th chapter of the book of Exodus.

Among other arrangements in this chapel, was one which was extraordinary, and, perhaps, unique, except in our modern vestry rooms, that of a chimney piece and fire place. On each side of it and above it were thirty-three vacant niches, with triple canopies, elaborately carved, and interspersed with crockets and finials; over which was a double cornice of plain and ornamental work, most tastefully embroidered. On the horizontal ledge above the chimney-piece, was this singular inscription from the Vulgate. (Gen. xxii 7

"Ecce ignis et ligna, ubi est victima holocausti?"

The turn of this arch, if arch it can be called, belonged to the late period of pointed architecture; consisting of two straight lines, inclining slightly upward to the centre, and rounded by a mere segment of a curve at each extreme, so as to meet the jambs of a fire place with an abruptness that did not harmonize with the general character of the component parts of the rest of the work.

Mr. Shaw describes the several inscriptions and embellishments of this truly interesting relic of antiquity, because, though the work must have evidently been executed before the Reformation, there was a total absence of the greater part of those corruptions of pure Christianity, which had been carried to the utmost point of endurance at the period immediately preceding that great event.

To form a just and adequate conception of the beauty, interest, and splendour of this chapel, however, Mr. Shaw considered it necessary to see and examine it on the spot. Considered as a work of art, it exhibited altogether a complete study of architecture and sculpture. Here was almost every form of arch, bidding defiance to all modern classifications. We had the semicircular and the lancet shaped; the obtuse angled and the acute; the Roman segment and the Gothic ogee; with dressings and mouldings of every description; round, hollow, square, and undulating. There was also a profusion of embellishments in the cornices and embattlements, the niches, the pinnacles, the canopies, and the cupolas, exhausting all the varieties of fruits and flowers and foliage; of vines and pomegranates, and lilies and roses, which are generally found to be accompaniments of ecclesiastical architecture. Viewed as a religious structure, the appearance of this chapel was calculated to produce an impression of awe and admiration. The inscriptions were solemn, appropriate, and scriptural. Every sentence, from the portals to the altar, was conducive to a feeling of sublimity and devotion.

Mr. Shaw concludes in these words, which have, indeed, a melancholy interest in connexion with the recent entire destruction of this chapel by fire, with the exception of half of the richly-carved oak door, and the altar, (see the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, No. 61.) "May the contemplation of such a work render us grateful to that Providence which has preserved it, and inspire us with that noble sentiment:—'Lord, I have loved the habitation of thy House, and the place wherein thine Honour dwelleth.'"

ST. MARY'S CHURCH, STAFFORD.

This large and fine cross-church is now in course of restoration, by Messrs. Scott and Moffatt, of Spring Gardens, London, and will shortly be completed. It is one of the most interesting churches in the county of Stafford: it has an octagon tower at the intersection of the nave and transept; it consists of a nave and two aisles, a chancel with side aisles, and a transept, which is 100 feet long and 25 feet broad. Most of the piers and arches of the church are of early English date, or belong to an early period of the decorated English style: there are some good windows of the decorated period, but the east window and some others are of perpendicular character. The upper part of the tower is of later date.

The font is a singular remnant of antiquity, very large, and of heavy workmanship; its height is three feet three inches; the lower part is two feet square, and is ornamented on three sides with human figures lying flat on their faces; on the south side is the figure of a ram. Among a variety of monuments, ancient and modern, in this church, those most worthy of notice are an altar-tomb in honour of Edward, Lord Aston, of Tixal, and his wife, Lady Ann; a monument to the memory of Sir Edward Aston, who erected the ancient mansion of Tixal (temp. Henry VIII.), and his lady, Joan; and one to Lady Barbara Compton, who, as the inscription informs us, "lyeth interred in the parish church of St. Gregory, by St. Paul's, London." The church of St. Mary, anterior to the Reformation, was collegiate; King Stephen, at the commencement of his reign, bestowed it on the Bishop and Chapter of Lichfield and Coventry. At the Dissolution, a dean and thirteen prebendaries were attached to it.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Alpha."—The population of the parish of Chesterfield, in the county of Derby, is correctly given in our last—11,231 inhabitants; the parish comprises the chapelry of Brimington, and the townships of Calow, Hasland, Newbold with Dunston, Tapton, Temple-Normanton, and Walton. The town of Chesterfield contains 6212 inhabitants.

We have received several letters pointing out the error in the engraving of the royal party in Windsor Great Park, in our paper of last week; wherein the positions are represented on the off side instead of the near side. The sketch in question was made by Mr. Wells, the animal painter, and engraved by Mr. Sly; and the error arose from inattention in not reversing the positions with the other details of the subject, in transferring it to the wood on which the drawing is engraved.

"A Constant Reader."—The property can be sold for the benefit of the creditors.

"X. Y."—The marriage is illegal.

THE STATE PROSECUTIONS IN IRELAND.—Some more portraits of public characters, with biographical notices, will appear in our next.

Our subscribers in Birmingham, Tamworth, Chesterfield, Lichfield, Nottingham, Derby, Grantham, Wirksworth, Chatsworth, and other places especially interested in her Majesty's visit, are informed that our paper of next week (Dec. 9) will contain illustrations connected with the above places; and we confidently promise a rich treat of Engravings to all.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1843.

One tendency of the present state of society, which late years have developed, with a distinctness not to be mistaken, is far from pleasant to the mind that is sufficiently removed from the sphere of action to be able to contemplate. We have recently poured out much virtuous indignation on the backsliding of the Americans, in the matter of their debts. We perceive, very plainly, the mote in our brother's eye—can we say that there is not a beam in our own? A perusal of the public journals—those portions of them that record mere facts, and do not state opinions—would lead any one to imagine that the agents of our trading and fiscal affairs live, move, and breathe, in a perfect atmosphere of fraud. If we progress at the same rate for half a generation longer, commercial dishonesty will become the rule, and integrity the exception. On every side of us we see perpetually —fraud, fraud, fraud. There are (or, we hope, in this office, we may say, were) frauds in the Exchequer—frauds in the Custom-house—frauds in the tea trade—frauds in the tobacco trade—frauds and adulteration in the sugar trade. There seems, absolutely, to be scarcely a branch of commerce that has escaped taint and infection. The Americans cheat their foreign creditors; we strike the balance of immorality, by plundering our Government at home. In both cases the impelling motive is that boundless passion for gain, which will accumulate at all hazards, and which, when instigated, unites every principle of honour and honesty, as with a moral pestilence. The reports of the Courts of Law during the week, exhibit the Crown acting as prosecutor against the members of a large City firm, to recover the penalties incurred by fraudulent dealings with the Custom-house—the transactions being shared in, and connived at, by persons employed in that establishment. In the Post-office, we have it stated, in the deliberate and solemn evidence of the secretary before a committee of the House of Commons, that the "robberies (of letters) are terrific!" How is it all to end? Can nothing be done to stem the torrent of corruption? or is it to sweep on unchecked, threatening to destroy the fabric of society, by shaking every confidence between man and man? It is a serious question, and some answer must be given to it.

Where the temptation to do evil constantly exists, it is generally found that the committing of that evil will be frequent in proportion to the facilities for perpetrating it undetected. The object of rulers, then, should be, taking it for granted that human nature, at the best, is frail and weak—very often wicked—to make these opportunities as few as possible, and keep a good watch that those few, if they must be unavoidably left open, should not be made use of by those they employ. By proper management some frauds could be entirely prevented. The Exchequer Bill forgeries were purely owing to the miserable mismanagement of that department. If it had been conducted with the average business tact and ability of any good banking house in the City, such wholesale plunder by a subordinate offices would have been impossible. But no one expects the head of a government department in England to know anything of the actual working of it, so his subordinate or his deputy does it, and he is a "highly respectable man," till at last it is found necessary to convict him as a forger and defaulter, and the good-natured public is mulcted to the tune of half a million to cover his deficiences. Such a fraud is simply bad management—a bungling in detail.

But there are other cases where the causes of the frauds lie deeper, and are more complex. The temptation is first held out by the laws themselves—the trader yields to those temptations, and seduces the officers of the Crown to assist in his nefarious schemes—of course, by admitting him to a share of the profits. Such a case as this is far more difficult to deal with than the first—but a remedy, even here, is not impossible. It is to this class of frauds belong all those cases, the details of which have caused so much consternation. But the full extent of the evil is far from revealed; the number of cases discovered are as nothing to those which escape detection. The profits are so immense, in consequence of the enormous amount of duties evaded, that the smuggling trader can afford to lose several ventures, provided he succeeds in one or two. The parties now under prosecution were only in the silk trade, but it is believed that the frauds in the tobacco import trade are quite as extensive. We hear of its being seized by tons at a time; and, with an expensive Coast Guard, and a vigilant Excise, the question is, how is it landed and transported about in such bulks? Quis custodiet custodes? Who keeps watch on the watchers? But it is not to these we must look for the prevention of this demoralising system—for a system it has become. It must be continually enforced as a practical truth, that an enormously high rate of duty, compared with the cost price of the article itself, will always be kept down to an unproductive point by the efforts of the smuggler. The ingenuity of men stimulated by the certainty of high profit will defeat the most stringent laws; of this the slave trade is a terrible example. Governments are not much influenced by moral considerations in the regulating the mode in which they levy the necessary revenue of the state; but they must be influenced by pecuniary ones; and our present system of high duties on articles of low actual cost, is evidently a suicidal one. The Government is losing, the people are being demoralised, and the honourable pursuit of trade and commerce is degenerating into gambling. There may thus be a sort of ethics even in taxation, though it has hitherto been a thing little dreamed of in the philosophy of statesmen. Society is evidently outgrowing many of the regulations and forms that were once practicable enough. London was once a trading city; it is now much more than this—it is a nation in itself; more populous than many independent states, and far richer than many kingdoms. The pressure of its enormous demands is breaking through every fetter which the rulers of other generations imposed on the sources of its supply; but the process is a struggle between the laws of the land and the wants of the people, in which it is evident the latter will prevail. Some attempt, therefore, must be made to bring them more in harmony than they are at present—a thing perfectly possible—and that without loss to the public revenue, to say nothing of the more healthy state of feeling which would be produced by the change.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

On Saturday morning the Queen and Prince Albert, and their illustrious guests, the Duke and Duchess de Nemours, left the Castle at twenty minutes before nine o'clock, escorted by a party of the Life Guards, commanded by Lieutenant Lowther, for Slough, from whence the royal party were conveyed by a special train to Paddington. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, and the Duke and Duchess de Nemours, attended by the royal suites, returned at four o'clock to the Castle, escorted by a party of the Life Guards, commanded by the Earl of Munster. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and Lady Charlotte Dundas, joined the royal dinner party.

On Sunday morning, at twenty minutes past seven o'clock, the Duke and Duchess de Nemours, attended by Countess D'Oraison, Je General Colbert, and le Capitaine de Reile, and also by the Marquis of Ormonde and Col. Wylde, took leave of her Majesty and Prince Albert, and left the Castle for town, to proceed thence to Woolwich, and thence to embark for Calais. Their Royal Highnesses having arrived in town by the Great Western Railway, went from Paddington to attend Mass, in the chapel of the French Ambassador. Their Royal Highnesses and suite afterwards left town, in the royal carriages, for Woolwich, to embark on L'Archimede, for Calais. The Marquis of Ormonde, Lord in Waiting on the Queen, and Colonel Wylde, Equerry in Waiting on Prince Albert, attended their Royal Highnesses to Woolwich.

THE DUC DE BORDEAUX.—His Royal Highness the Duc de Bordeaux reached his residence, 35, Belgrave-square, on Monday evening, and was received on his arrival by M. de Chateaubriand, having quitted Arwick on Sunday. Tuesday morning was the period fixed for the departure of the faithful Frenchmen who have come over to this country. His Royal Highness was attended in the grand saloon by M. the Duc de Levis, M. the Duc Decazes, Admiral Villaret de Joyeuse, M. de Barande, &c. The Hanoverian Minister had the honour of an audience, to deliver a letter from his Sovereign to the Duc de Bordeaux. M. de Chateaubriand first presented all the French in mass—the number of whom amounted to about 100—and the Prince Gaston de Montmorency and the Duc de Levis then introduced each gentleman in person to his Royal Highness. M. Berryer presented the deputies who had arrived, namely, the Duc de Valmy, the Marquis de Pastoret, and Count Blin de Bourdon. The scene is described to have been most affecting. The remembrance of the fate of Louis XVI., to whom his Royal Highness bears such a striking resemblance—the recollection of the death of the Duc de Berry—the circumstances attending the birth of his son—the events of 1830—it is stated, forced themselves on the attention of all who were present, and caused the flowing of many tears of sympathy for the unfortunate Prince. The arrivals from France continue to be numerous; so much so, that it is stated upwards of three hundred French noblemen, of high lineage and illustrious birth, assembled yesterday at the apartments of M. de Chateaubriand, for the purpose of presenting an address to that venerable gentleman. The Duc de Fitzjames read the address, to which M. de Chateaubriand, with considerable emotion, appropriately replied.

The Earl of Auckland and Hon. Misses Eden, and a select party, are visiting Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston, at Broadlands, Hants.

ALTON TOWERS.—The Earl and Countess of Shrewsbury returned, on Friday last, from Burton Constable

The Countess of Tankerville, Earl and Countess of Chesterfield, Hon Colonel Anson, M.P., and Hon Mrs. Anson, Hon Charles Gore, Mr and Mrs John Stanley, and a numerous circle, are assembled at Hoolee Hall, Sir William Massey Stanley's seat in Cheshire. On Friday the Lourds met at the Hall, and a grand hunt sportsmen were present.

Sir Robert Peel left his residence in Whitehall-gardens, on Saturday morning, for his seat, Drayton Manor, Staffordshire

A dinner party was given on Friday night, by the Lord Chancellor and Lady Lyndhurst, to meet the distinguished guests of the French bar. M. Berryer it included his Grace the Duke of Wellington, the Earl of Haddington, Lord Wharncliffe, the Lord Chief Justice Denman, the Lord Chief Baron Alexger, the Baron de Malthaus, the Hanoverian Minister, the Rt. Hon. Henry Smith, &c.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—The Earl of March, eldest son of the Duke and Duchess of Richmond, was married at one o'clock on Tuesday morning, to Frances Harriett, eldest daughter of the Hon. Captain Greville. The bride cake was given away by the Duke of Wellington was attired in white satin, with superb flounces of Brussels lace, and a magnificent veil of the same costly material. The bridesmaids were the Ladies Adelaide and Augusta and Lord Colin Gordon Lennox; Misses Georgiana and Augusta Greville, Miss Louisa Cox, and the Misses Mills. Immediately after the ceremony the Earl and Countess of March left town for Goodwood Park, Sussex.

Mr. Henry Lytton Bulwer entertained a select party at dinner on Tuesday, previous to his departure for Madrid.

Lord and Lady John Russell and family are expected to leave Minto Castle the second week in the ensuing month, on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Bedford, at Woburn Abbey, where they intend to pass the Christmas recess. Her ladyship's health is quite re-established.

His Royal Highness the Duke de Bordeaux and suite arrived on Monday in Berkeley-square, No 35, Sir John Shelley's mansion, from a visit to the Duke of Northumberland, at Alnwick Castle. The Duke entertained a select party of 16 at dinner in the evening.

The Duke of Wellington, after attending the nuptials of the Earl of March and Miss Greville in St. George's Church, proceeded immediately to the Eastern-square terminus, and left town by the Birmingham Railway for Drayton Manor, Staffordshire, to have the honour of meeting her Majesty.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—The Hon. Wellington S. Cotton, eldest son of General Viscount Combermere, is about to be married to Miss Stisell, eldest daughter of Sir George and Lady Stisell.

The Duchess of Gloucester continues indisposed. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and other members of the Royal Family, sent on Wednesday to Gloucester House, to inquire after the health of their illustrious relative. Many of the nobility called to learn the state of the Royal Duchess. The answers given yesterday were, "Her Royal Highness is going on very favourably."

Sir James Graham left town yesterday morning, for his seat, Netherby Hall, Cumberland. The Earl of Lincoln had an interview with the right hon. baronet on Thursday morning at the Home-office.

DEPARTURE OF THE DUKE AND DUCHESS DE NEMOURS.

WOOLWICH, Sunday, Nov. 26.—A guard of honour of the Royal Marines, with the band and colours of the regiment, under the command of Captain Mitford, arrived at the dock-yard shortly after nine this morning, on its being communicated to the authorities at Woolwich that the Duke and Duchess of Nemours would embark at that royal port in the course of the day, and a field battery of the Royal Artillery, under the command of Major Otway, arrived about nine o'clock, and occupied a station on the wharf wall of the dock yard, to fire a royal salute on the arrival, and on the departure of their illustrious guests. At a quarter past nine o'clock several of the carriages of the suite of the Duke and Duchess of Nemours arrived at the dock yard, and informed the authorities that the royal party had gone to change their dresses when they left Buckingham Palace, and that they might be expected about ten o'clock. A few minutes before ten o'clock his Excellency Comte St. Aulaire, La Comtesse St. Aulaire, the Count Chabot, Chargé d'Affaires, and Count Bresson, Consul General, arrived at Woolwich to receive the Duke and Duchess de Nemours; and at five minutes past ten o'clock the royal party arrived at the dock-yard in one of her Majesty's carriages, the field battery firing a royal salute, and the guard of honour of the Royal Marines presenting arms, and the band playing the national anthem.

After conversing a few minutes with Major-General Sir H. D. Ross and several of the officers, Commander Smith received the Duchess de Nemours along the wharf from the carriage and down the steps, which were covered with green cloth, leading to the place of embarkation; and the tide being low, their royal highnesses entered the barge of the Admiral Superintendent, and Mary yacht, accompanied by the Comte St. Aulaire, and immediately proceeded to the Archimede, French steam-vessel, moored in the river. The crew of the vessel manned the yards on the approach of the Duke and Duchess de Nemours, and at the moment they stepped on board the men gave three cheers, which were responded to by a second royal salute from the field battery under the command of Major Otway. On the firing ceasing the flag on the head on board the Archimede steamer displayed French ears, and a number of the officers of the garrison and dock-yard went on board to bid the royal party farewell.

The Archimede was decorated from an early hour of the morning with numerous flags, and presented a very gay appearance, and on the English naval and military officers returning on shore a salute was fired on board.

The Archimede did not leave until one o'clock, p. m., on account of the state of the tide, and when she left her moorings she fired a parting salute. At a quarter before 5 she ran aground on the High Sand, about 12 miles below or eastward of Gravesend. At half-past 11 o'clock on Monday morning an Aide-de-Camp of the Admiral (Cay) addressed himself to the chairman of the Star Company for a vessel to proceed to the ship and convey his Royal Highness to Gravesend, in order to proceed thence to Dover by land, if the Archimede should not come afloat at high water. The Comet steamer was promptly despatched; but upon reaching the ship it appeared that the latter had got afloat, and it was intended to proceed on the voyage at daylight. The pilot who had charge alleges in his own excuse that he was strongly urged to proceed, and being dark, he found himself nearer to some vessels than he had expected, when suddenly altering the helm to clear them, the ship struck the ground.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD, Nov. 25.—It was resolved unanimously, in convocation on Thursday week, to grant £25 out of the University chest towards erecting a School room at Wantage, Berkshire. The steps necessary to fill the two vacant Craven Scholarships took place on Tuesday, the 28th ult.

The Rector of Exeter has been elected President of the Oxford Female Penitentiary, in the room of the late Provost of the Oriel College.

The Rev. Richard Mitchell, late Fellow of Lincoln College, and the Dean of Ely, are candidates for the Headship of the East India College.

The Rev. Thomas Thompson has been elected head master of the Free Grammar School, North Walsham, Norfolk.

Earl Manvers has presented the Rev. J. W. Brooks to the vicarage of St. Mary's, Nottingham—value, £600 per annum.

The Rev. T. Hope has been presented to the perpetual curacy of Hatton, Warwickshire—value, £105 per annum.

The Lord Bishop of Winchester has presented the Rev. S. J. I. Lockhart, late of Lincoln College, to the vicarage of Hurstbourne Priors, with the curacy of Bourne, Hants—value, £203 per annum.

DEATH OF THE VICAR OF WALTON-ON-THE-HILL.—The Rev. Thomas Moss, the respected vicar of Walton-on-the-Hill, who has occupied the living 27 years, and had attained the 76th year of his age, was in Liverpool on Thursday week, apparently enjoying excellent health, but on the next morning, between ten and eleven o'clock, he was seized with a fit, which continued till four o'clock in the afternoon, and then terminated his existence.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

ARRIVAL OF INDIAMEN IN THE RIVER.—A fleet of ships came up the river with the flood tide on Saturday, many of which have been bearing about in the channel for some days. No less than five large vessels from the Mauritius passed Blackwall during the day, and at high water in the afternoon the London, East Indiaman, Captain Attwood, from Madras, and the Dartmouth, Captain Jacobs, from Bombay, were hauled into the East India Docks

EARLY CLOSING.—Messrs. Swan and Edgar, Piccadilly; Mr. Redmayne, Bond street; Messrs. Hitchcock and Rogers, St. Paul's Churchyard; Messrs Peters and Underwood, Sloane-square; Mr. Owen, Great Coram street; Mr. Edwards, Soho-square, and others, close their respective establishments at seven o'clock, examples which it is to be hoped will be followed by the drapers generally.

and that the public will lend their aid to this desirable object, by abstaining from evening purchases.

The Mark Lane Express states that the annual show of the Smithfield Club will take place at the Bazaar, in Baker-street, Portman-square, and that—thanks to the indomitable perseverance and energy of British farmers, in spite of all the difficulties which they have experienced, and the still more doubtful prospect before them—the general character of the show will not fall short of those which have preceded it.

A meeting was held on Monday night at the Running Horse, Little Queen-street, Lincoln's Inn-fields, for the purpose of completing the formation of an Anti-Corn Law Association for that district.

SERIOUS ACCIDENT AT THE SURREY THEATRE.—On Monday night, during the first performance of the "Bohemians of Paris," at the Surrey Theatre, Mrs. R. Honner met with a most unfortunate accident. In the first act she has to jump from a bridge to the stage, a height of near fifteen feet, and in doing so she missed the mattress that should have broken her fall. Mrs. Honner was so severely injured as to render it impossible for her to appear when again required. In consequence of the accident, Mrs. H. Vining is at present playing Mrs. Honner's part in the piece.

THE BANK OF ENGLAND.—In consequence of the numerous complaints that have been made by the merchants in the City and the public at the employés of the Bank issuing sovereigns and half sovereigns that are found to be light in weight according to the royal proclamation of her Majesty, dated the 2nd day of last October, orders have been given to the clerks by the governors of this national establishment, that no gold shall be issued unless it has been previously weighed, and is according to the standard currency of the realm. Henceforth all light sovereigns presented at the Bank will only be received according to weight, and will be defaced, so as to prevent the possibility of their being re-issued.

SOCIETY FOR CONSUMPTION.—On Tuesday evening a special general court of the governors and subscribers of the above hospital, was held at the Board-room, for the purpose of taking into consideration the report of the committee which had been appointed to carry into execution the enlargement of the present building, which is situated at Chelsea. Dr. Forbes, M.D., in the chair. Amongst the governors present were—the Earl of Arundel and Surrey; the Rev. C. Kingsley; Drs Thompson, Dickson, and Roe; Messrs. J. De Gex, P. Roe (the founder), Alexander Hall Hall, Otho Hamilton Brown, S. C. Hull, &c. The report for the past year showed that since the opening of the hospital in September last, 198 patients have passed through its wards, and the number of out-patients now amount to 1367, the major portion of whom have received essential relief. The annual subscriptions amounts to £800.

ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—On Tuesday evening the first meeting for the season of this Society was numerously attended by members at their new house, adjoining the Royal Agricultural Society's mansion, in Hanover-square. William Yarrell, Esq., V.P., in the chair: when a paper by Mr. Gervais, of the Academie Royale de Paris, was read, on a new method of preserving the skins of animals and birds, by means of sour tannic. Professor Owen then read a communication on a remarkable and newly-discovered bird called Dinornis, being a genus of gigantic terrestrial bird, which has now, like the Dodo in the Mauritius, become extinct in the island of New Zealand. The name Dinornis, given by the New Zealanders to this bird, is the same as that given by the Malays to the peacock.

ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.—A very full ordinary meeting of members was held on Monday evening, Mr. Murchison, F.R.S., President, in the chair, at which, amongst other distinguished travellers who were present, was Captain Sir Geo. Back. It was announced by Colonel Jackson, the Secretary, that a letter had been received from Mr. Schomburgk, on his return to Demerara, from his journey up to the sources of the Essequibo, in which he had been engaged nearly three years, and without a single loss by death, although his party underwent great privations. A paper was read from Mr. Bailey, on the two different lines of route by which it was proposed to open a marine communication across the Isthmus of Panama, between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. A letter was read from Captain Hamilton, giving a very interesting account of his journey on a line midway between Sydney and Moreton Bay, in order to discover a new cattle pasturage. One of the most remarkable of the geographical features of the country was the very great gorge of ravines running parallel to the direction of the heights, some of which made a sudden and almost perpendicular descent from the rivers of two to three thousand feet deep. This part of the country, which is termed New England, is of great fertility, the scenery is very picturesque and the vegetation most profuse.

BOROUGH OF SOUTHWARK.—On Wednesday morning a highly influential and respectable meeting of the inhabitants of the Borough of Southwark was held at the Bridge-house Hotel, London-bridge, to consider the propriety of petitioning the Court of Common Council to adopt efficient measures to extend their privileges and franchise, and, for more effectually uniting the Borough with the City, and Corporation of London, and to place the inhabitants on the same footing as the free and enrolled citizens of London. Jeremiah Pilcher, Esq., the late Sheriff of London, was called to the chair. Messrs Schofield, Gross, Harris, Curling, Cornwall, the High Bailiff, and several other influential gentlemen, addressed the meeting. It was urged that the inhabitants of the Borough paid a moiety to the City of £25,000; and Southwark was formerly part and parcel of the City; and that there was no earthly reason why the inhabitants should not enjoy the municipal rights of which they were deprived. It was proposed that the many wards according to the various parishes, and that each ward should possess an alderman and a certain number of Common Council. (Hear, hear.) Resolutions, and a petition to Parliament, in accordance with the foregoing, having been agreed to, the meeting separated.

ORPHAN WORKING SCHOOL, CITY-ROAD.—On Wednesday the half-yearly general meeting of the friends and subscribers to this charity was held at the Hall of Commerce, in Threadneedle-street, when a report was presented by the committee and read by Mr. J. Soul, the Secretary, stating that the schools were in a prosperous condition. The number of boys had increased during the many wards according to the various parishes, and that each ward should possess an alderman and a certain number of Common Council. (Hear, hear.) Resolutions, and a petition to Parliament, in accordance with the foregoing, having been agreed to, the meeting separated.

ORPHAN WORKING SCHOOL, CITY-ROAD.—On Wednesday the half-yearly general meeting of the friends and subscribers to this charity was held at the Hall of Commerce, in Threadneedle-street, when a report was presented by the committee and read by Mr. J. Soul, the Secretary, stating that the schools were in a prosperous condition. The number of boys had increased during the past twelve months, and that each ward should possess an alderman and a certain number of Common Council. (Hear, hear.) Resolutions, and a petition to Parliament, in accordance with the foregoing, having been agreed to, the meeting separated.

GRESHAM COLLEGE.—These lectures for this term terminated last week, the total number of auditors being 719, or an average of 40 to each of the seventeen lectures. There has been no improvement in the attendance at their delivery over that at the City of London School, and but little from the old room at the late Royal Exchange.

A deputation from a body designating themselves the White Quakers, has just visited London. They have been extensively engaged in placarding the walls and boards at the west end of the town during the last week with some of their fanatical effusions, denouncing vengeance on all but the favoured few. Their appearance in Regent-street excited great curiosity.

WALBROOK WARD.—An opposition, in the shape of a very formidable requisition is getting up on the recent conduct of Alderman Gibbs, which will render the proceedings of the Wardmote on the meeting St. Thomas's-day anything but unanimous, especially as far as the Alderman is concerned.

MECHANICS' INSTITUTION.—The twentieth anniversary of the London Mechanics' Institution was celebrated on Tuesday night by a concert in their theatre. The programme contained the names of some of our best and most popular English singers.

HAMMERSMITH BRIDGE.—PREVENTION FROM DROWNING.—Owing to the accidents which have occurred to the workmen engaged in the repairs of this suspension bridge, one having been drowned, and another nearly so, the contractor for the work, Mr. Cubitt, has very properly decided upon, and actually furnished the workmen with the newly invented shirt-fronts and cravats. These life preservers are now, it appears, regularly worn (inflated) by the men at their perilous work, and they were at first surprised to find how easily they could perform their various duties with this vesture on them; and they now go on confidently with their occupations, not apprehensive of the usual consequences of a sudden fall into the river.

THE TRIAL OF LIEUTENANTS MUNRO AND GRANT.—The trial of these officers was on Wednesday resumed between course to take place at one o'clock on the day. It appears that the authorities of the War-office had compelled the accused to surrender, on pain of forfeiting their commissions. There are 33 witnesses to be examined for the prosecution, and it is currently reported that some important circumstances are likely to transpire that will throw some additional light upon the original cause of quarrel.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.—In pursuance of an order of the House of Commons in June last, a return was made of the sums paid to the metropolitan police for extraordinary service, not included in the return of the expense of the force annually laid before Parliament. The return in question is made from 1830 to 1842, and the total amounts to £19,552 17s. 6d. The first year's estimate was £3333 7s. 6d., and the last, £3,146 8s. 6d.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

ALARMING ACCIDENT AT A BREWERY AT TWICKENHAM.—An alarming accident occurred on Saturday to a man named Nathaniel Osborn, 40 years of age. It appears that Osborne, who was employed as a brewer at the Northcote Brewery, Twickenham, was standing upon the brickwork of a copper, which was full of boiling wort, arranging something connected with it, when, from some cause, both his feet slipped from under him, and as an instant he had fallen per... into the boiling liquid; fortunately, however, in his descent, he had caught hold of the sides of the boiler, which not only prevented his being wholly immersed, but enabled him to scramble out of his truly painful situation, not, however, before his lower extremities were shockingly scalded. The poor man a fellow-workman instantly rushed to his assistance, and present relief having been obtained, he was conveyed to St. George's Hospital, where he remains in a deplorable state.

A MAN DROWNED IN BED.—On Friday night week a lighterman, named David Austin, moored his barge, which was heavily laden, close to the Temple, and went to bed in the cabin. Upon the tide turning, the barge having become firmly imbedded in the mud, did not rise with the water, which flowed into the cabin where Austin slept, and in the morning he was discovered in a situation, not, however, before his lower extremities were shockingly scalded. The poor man a fellow-workman instantly rushed to his assistance, and present relief having been obtained, he was conveyed to St. George's Hospital, where he remains in a deplorable state.

KING'S COLLEGE HOSPITAL.—On Wednesday afternoon a meeting of governors was held in the board-room of the hospital, Portugal street, Lincoln's-inn, the Rev. J. H. Frisk, vice-president, in the chair. Mr. E. C. Stevens, the secretary, read the report, which, gave a most satisfactory account of the general efficiency of the institution. The number of in-patients, 329; out-patients, 3110—Total, 3439—visited during the quarter ending at Michaelmas last. On the motion of Major Wyvile, the report was received and adopted. Thanks were then voted to the chairman, and the meeting separated.

CHILD STEALING. On Monday last a servant of Mr. Hellens, of Wolverley-street, Goldsmith-street, Hackney-road, was sent with an infant of her master's, aged four months, to Whitechapel, and as she was returning she was accosted by a fashionably-dressed female about 24 years of age, who asked her to go to a neighbouring shop for some trifling article, offering to hold the infant during the nurse's absence. The nurse, little suspecting that a trick was intended, handed the infant to the lady, and went on her message. Upon her return not, ther the lady nor infant was to be found, and, although every effort has been made no clue has as yet been had to either one or the other. The wretched parents are in a state bordering on distraction.

DESTITUTION IN THE METROPOLIS.—At a meeting of the committee consisting of Lord Dudley Stuart, Viscount Ranelagh, General Sir De Lacy Evans, Sir Joseph Copley, Mr. J. A. Smith, M.P., and others, recently appointed at the public meeting held at the Western Literary Institution, and convened on Wednesday at the Sablonière Hotel, in Leicester-square, final arrangements for a great public meeting in behalf of the destitute poor of the metropolis, and for establishing an institution, to be called the Western Refuge for the Destitute, were come to. The proposed meeting is to be held at Exeter Hall in the course of the ensuing week.

PENCILLINGS IN THE FOUR COURTS, FROM THE SKETCH OF AN IRISH BARRISTER.

COUNSEL FOR THE TRAVERSERS.

MR. RICHARD MOORE, Q.C.,

is descended of a highly respectable Tipperary family, and was, some years ago, Assistant Barrister for that county. He resigned his office at length, on account of his large practice, and was succeeded by Sergeant Howley. His business, in all the courts, is, perhaps, more extensive than any other at the bar. In pleading he has been eminently successful, and is thought by the present Lord Chancellor Sugden. Mr. Moore is a man of deep legal research and general reading, of extremely gentlemanlike manner, and most winning address; and never did the possession of these high qualifications prove of more signal service to any cause he undertook to advocate than on the celebrated 15th of last month, when he led in the argument which caused the Lord Chief Justice to re-consider and recall his opinion, and defeated, so far, her Majesty's Attorney-General. Mr. Moore's politics are of mildly liberal shade. Until a short time before the late Administration resigned office, he was a Conservative. He changed, as far as wordly interest was concerned, at the wrong time, and had to suffer some slight occasional annoyance on account of the step he thus had taken, from his old political friends at the bar and elsewhere. This, however, he soon got over, and should a change of Administration take place during his lifetime, his elevation to the bench is an understood thing, and may be looked on as a matter of certainty. Mr. Moore was called to the bar in 1807; is about 60 years of age; has a very independent fortune; is of a friendly, hospitable disposition, and is much respected in private life by all who enjoy his acquaintance.

MR. JONATHAN HENN, Q. C.,

is looked on as a sort of black letter giant that few forensic champions would like to grapple with. On the 15th of this month, whilst he followed Mr. Moore in the argument, the discussion in court was of an extraordinary character, and the effect he produced most powerful. He is unmarried and enjoys a large fortune, to which circumstances may be attributed his refusing business very often, no matter how large the fee may be with which the brief is marked. He is a most enthusiastic disciple of Izaak Walton, and when he has made up his mind to indulge his piscatory predilections, the highest law authorities have no charms, and the largest fees no power of attraction. Talking of his fishing, reminds me of a celebrated fishery case in which he was opposed at Limerick by the present Attorney-General who received a very large fee to go thither from the Leinster circuit. On that occasion, the latter unfortunately displayed an infirmity of temper, and in the heat of the contest indulged in something bordering on personal acerbity, whereupon Mr. Henn observed that "he learned friend might possibly fancy he came there to teach them law and not manners, but that much pleasure in complying with the request of the board, and have unanimously agreed to accommodate them with the use of their room for a few days.'

From that time (1794) the society continued its career with great success, numbering among its brilliant roll most of the honoured members of the university, and amongst those many of the names distinguished in public affairs in Ireland down to the present day. In 1815 disputes again broke out between the board and the society on the old point of grievance—the proper amount of license in debate—and the case being supposed incapable of remedy, the society hastily dissolved itself. During this long period it had witnessed and fostered the first essays of many—it might almost be said, of nearly all who made the established Church of Ireland and the Irish bar so highly distinguished. With respect to the latter, it is at this moment a curious fact that nearly all those to whose care the state prosecutions now pending have been confided, as well as of the advocates of the accused, have been, in their earlier days, children of the Irish Alma Mater. In the year 1815, the following are a few of the distinguished men who had been members of the society:—Drs. Hall (Bishop of Dromore), Hamilton, Stack, Stopford, the Deans of Ardagh and Cork, Drs. Miller (author of the "Philosophy of History"), Usher, Burrowes, Prior Kyle (the present Bishop of Cork), Sadleir (the present Provost of the University). All these had been Fellows of College. In the senate and at the bar were named—Lord Ross, the Lord Chief Justice, the Lord Chief Baron; Judges Day, Osborne, Fox, and Mayne; the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General; Right Hon. W. C. Plunkett; Sergeants Browne and Ball. To this is added a long list of persons whose names are since more highly distinguished—the late Dr. Radcliffe, Judges Ball and Lefroy, the present Solicitor-General, and both the Pennefathers.

Since 1815 the society was never revived until the exertions of a few who had vainly sought advantage from debating societies without the walls were at length effectual, and the sanction of the board was granted for a revival of the Trinity College Historical Society.

The meeting of which I have just given a sketch was attended by a considerable number of the Fellows, and an old M.A. of the University, Mr. Foote, rendered it additionally interesting, by giving up the property in books, papers, &c., which had remained for twenty-eight years in his hands, as an officer of the old society. His address was short, feeling, and spirit-stirring, and one of the happiest things to the point I ever listened to in any assembly.

It was with pleasurable sensations of no ordinary description, that I found myself on Friday night, the 17th inst., removed from the noise and turbulence of the political waters, and the witness of a scene rendered almost sacred from the spot on which it was enacted, and the classic memories which it recalled. On that night I was present at the revival of the Historical Society of Trinity College, and in the very room in which its eloquent deliberations had formerly taken place. Not a member of the Irish University myself, I was, with the exception of a London editor of celebrity, my companion on the occasion, the only person present undistinguished by the academic costume; and we owed the gratifying treat to the politeness of a gentleman in office, who sent us tickets for admission on hearing that it was our wish to witness the proceedings. As the address was not given to the Dublin papers, nor indeed to any other in the empire, I first ascertained that it would not be disagreeable to the talented young speaker before I transcribed the notes which I took of it. A few minutes after I entered the room, the Rev. Dr. Sadlier, the Provost of the College, was called to the chair, and Mr. Magee, a grandson of the celebrated Dr. Magee, late Archbishop of Dublin, rose, and after the cheering which greeted his appearance had subsided, delivered the following inaugural address to the distinguished company assembled

Mr. President and Gentlemen,

If ever there were a moment when a sense of duty might be permitted to yield to a deep and unaffected sense of deficiency—if ever there were a time when the ambition which would prompt me to occupy a post of honour might be lost in the fear which would induce me to shun disgrace, when the gratitude for the kindness which has conferred a dearly-prized distinction might be absorbed in the conscious dread that I shall prove myself unworthy of it, it is this moment, when in virtue of that office which I am so proud to fill, I am called on to perform a task, from which an intellect more gifted—a spirit more daring than his who now addresses you—might not blush to shrink.

When I see assembled here this evening all that is learned and dignified—all that is talented and brilliant in our university, when I look around this room and see it filled not only with the most distinguished of mine own age and standing, but with the most honoured of my seniors; when I see the heads of our college testifying by their presence here the deep interest they take in the proceedings of this evening; and when I see those who might have been supposed to have forgotten the scenes of their youth in the triumph of their mature years, returning to give to our meeting the sanction of their approval, and the lustre of their fame—I cannot but wonder at the presumption which could hope to engage for a moment the attention of such an audience; and truly, if I were to suffer my thoughts to dwell only on the dignity and talent of this assembly, no sense of duty, however strong—no promptings of ambition, however vehement—could induce me to appear before you. But when I call to mind what it is that brought you here, when I remember what it is I am called to congratulate you for—when I remember that we have met to hail the revival of the College Historical Society, all thoughts of self are lost in the deep feelings of joy with which I behold an event so auspicious—or if at this moment, or in this place, amidst all the varied emotions this scene excites, a selfish fear should rise, it would be dispelled by the pleasure which I see reflected in the faces of those around me; for it is not in moments of joy and of mutual congratulation that men are disposed to be critical at such a time; I may hope that the faults of the orator will pass unnoticed, or may meet with that kind indulgence which your calmer judgment would not have accorded. And while I feel that I would vainly endeavour to raise a strain of triumph worthy of such an occasion, I rejoice to know that your own hearts will more than supply all that my words may fail to express, and that my feeble strain will be lost in the exulting chorus which your own feelings are at this moment raising.

[We are compelled to break off here, but shall resume the report of the address next week.]

NEWSPAPER

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO THE MIDLAND COUNTIES

On Tuesday morning last the Queen and Prince Albert left Windsor on a visit to Sir Robert Peel at Drayton Manor.

It was understood that on the preceding night the carriages and horses were ordered to be in readiness for her Majesty's departure at a quarter past eight o'clock in the morning, and accordingly about that time they were in waiting in the Great Quadrangle of Windsor Castle, where the private apartments of the Sovereign are situate. The morning was peculiarly bright for the present season of the year. The sun shone forth in full splendour, and the beautiful landscape which expands before the eye of the spectator from the Castle was lighted up in all its varied tints.

ALOT AT MWORT

It was about five minutes past nine o'clock when her Majesty, accompanied by Prince Albert, stepped into her carriage, and by this time a considerable number of the inhabitants of Windsor had collected in the precincts of the Castle, and in the streets, to witness the departure of the royal party. The cortège consisted of three travelling carriages, with outriders in the royal livery. The first was of the chariot shape, drawn by four horses, and was occupied by the Queen and Prince Albert, who were escorted by a detachment of the Life Guards, under the command of Lieut. Bolton.

The royal suite in attendance on her Majesty and her illustrious consort followed in two carriages and four, and consisted of the Lady in Waiting on the Queen, Lady Portman; the Maids of Honour in Waiting on the Queen, the Hon.

LIVTON-ME

DRAYTON MANOR, THE SEAT OF THE RIGHT HON. SIR ROBERT PEEL, BART.

Miss Liddell and the Hon. Amelia Murray; the Master of the Horse, the Earl of Jersey; the Lord in Waiting on the Queen, the Marquess of Ormonde; the Treasurer to Prince Albert, Mr G. L. Anson; the Equerry in Waiting on her Majesty, Major-General Wemyss; and the Equerry in Waiting on his Royal Highness, Col Bouverie.

On quitting the Quadrangle the Royal cortège passed through George IV.'s Gateway, and, descending at a slow pace, the hill towards Eton, proceeded to Slough, her Majesty and Prince Albert acknowledging the loyal demonstrations of the inhabitants who had assembled on the line.

As soon as the hill was cleared, the Horses attached to the Royal carriages mended their pace, and passed very briskly through Eton. In the latter place, the "Eton boys" were out, lining the road on each side; and perhaps it is needless to describe what a fervid greeting these youthful subjects gave their Sovereign as she passed along. The Royal party then went rapidly on through Slough, where the whole population had "turned out" to see the Queen, and diverging from the main line, proceeded by a narrow cross country road towards Uxbridge.

The first place which the Royal cortège passed on this road was a small village, consisting of a few cottages, called, as we are told, Westmoor-green, Langley. At this point the road was thronged by the villagers, who left their cottages and their daily toil to cheer their Sovereign as she passed along.

LINTON St

Shortly after quitting this village the escort of the Life Guards was relieved by a body of the 13th Light Dragoons, and throughout the rest of the journey to Watford station, from which place her Majesty travelled by railway, the service of the escort was performed by different detachments of the last-named regiment. After leaving Westmoor-green, nothing worthy of particular remark was observable on the road, until the Royal cortége approached the vicinity of Uxbridge. Here the population had not entirely confined itself to the limits of the town, but many persons had strolled out, and posted themselves along the road, as if their impatience to see the Queen was too great to allow them to remain quietly in Uxbridge. The cortége advance rapidly along, the Queen and Prince being loudly cheered, and dashed into the High-street, which was densely thronged by the population of the place and neighbourhood, amidst the merry ringing of the church bells, and the huzzaing of the people. Her Majesty reached Uxbridge about ten minutes to ten o'clock, and here the horses were changed with a celerity which would have struck amazement into the soul of a continental postilion.

Watford station was now distant about twelve miles, and the way to it was still by a cross country road, but this road was different in its character from that which had just been passed over. The road from Windsor to Uxbridge (in distance about ten miles) is in general level, and the country, over which a view is occasionally obtained as one travels along, is rather hilly. From Uxbridge to Watford station the landscape entirely changes, and the country is broken and irregular, presenting at different points the most delightful pictures to the eye of the traveller.

The groups of country people who had collected at different points from neighbouring villages now became more numerous, and the road-side houses appeared more frequent. The uneven nature of this road made it necessary that the "drag" should be applied more than once to the royal carriages, yet the horses went over the whole of the ground in excellent time.

It was near eleven o'clock when the Queen and the Prince reached the Watford station, the distance from Windsor (about 22 miles, having been gone over in some minutes less than two hours.

As her Majesty's route did not lay through the town of Watford, no opportunity was afforded to the inhabitants of evincing their loyalty by the usual preparations; but they poured out in vast numbers on the road by which her Majesty was to travel, which passes across the top of the town where the cross roads meet, and so on towards the station, which is about three-quarters of a mile distant.

At the station the arrangements made to receive her Majesty were on a very handsome scale, considering the shortness of the notice, and the few facilities offered by the place itself. The road by which her Majesty was to approach lies over the bridge that arches the line of rail, and after running parallel with the side of the station a distance of about 100 yards, sweeps round to the left into a very spacious court-yard at the back of the station.

At the opposite end of this court-yard is the point of ingress to the station at the back; and here a very handsome reception chamber was prepared. A lofty and spacious room, or saloon, one side of which was completely thrown open, was very tastefully decorated with crimson cloth, in front at the top formed into handsome drapery, and presenting the appearance of a pro-scenium. The roof and sides were covered with fluted cloth, pink and white alternately, and the floor was carpeted with crimson of the same material as the upper drapery.

A staircase of easy descent led from this entrance immediately on to the north platform, which was fitted up to correspond with the vestibule, and also covered with crimson cloth. The south platform was similarly decorated, but in the entrance portico, and, indeed, in every direction where it was necessary for her Majesty to pass, the eye was met by evergreens and shrubs of the choicest description. It is hardly necessary to add, that the royal standard, and an infinity of lesser flags, floated in the breeze from the most commanding points of view. To judge from the crowded state of the vicinity of the terminus at half-past ten o'clock, when the train came in from London, one might fairly suppose that the town of Watford was altogether deserted for the time. A general order necessary order had been issued to keep the platforms of the various stations clear throughout the line; but with a desire that the residents in the principal towns on the routs should not be disappointed, arrangements were made by the directors for the issue of a certain number of admission tickets.

Along the road, upon and around the bridge, and outside the court-yard before alluded to, there were hundreds of people, from the gentry and ladies of the neighbourhood in their open carriages down to the peasantry, the men in their simple frocks, and the women in gay holiday dress. Great as had been the expectation, the enthusiasm was greater when at last the royal outriders appeared in sight; and as the carriage containing the Queen and her Consort drove over the bridge, and round into the court-yard up to the reception-chamber, where they were to alight, the cheering was most spirit-stirring, and indeed the whole conduct of the multitude all that the most loyal heart could wish.

ARRIVAL OF HER MAJESTY AND PRINCE ALBERT AT WATFORD.

Her Majesty's punctuality is proverbial, but on the present occasion she arrived nearly half-an-hour before the time appointed. On alighting at the reception-room, the Queen and the Prince were received Mr. Glyn, the chairman of the board of directors, Messrs F. Letsom, Booth, and Greenfell, directors; Mr. Hardwick, the architect; and other officers of the company.

Her Majesty wore a satin plaid dress, with black velvet tunic, and an open straw bonnet, trimmed with blue. Prince Albert was attired in a blue surtout coat, with tweed trousers. Both her Majesty and the Prince looked remarkably well.

The special train, which was to convey the royal visitors to Tamworth, had previously arrived from London, bringing the directors and their friends. As soon as the whole of the suite had alighted, the royal carriages were wheeled round to the back of the station, where they were placed upon trucks, and attached to the train. By twenty minutes past eleven these arrangements were completed, and the state carriage was drawn up opposite the door of the waiting-room.

In our engravings upon the preceding page, are shown the Exterior and Interior of the Royal Carriage, and the Engine which, on Tuesday, conveyed the royal train from the Watford station, on the London and Birmingham Railway, to the Hampton station on the Midland Counties' line; and the details of her Majesty's progress will be found in subsequent pages of the paper.

At twenty-two minutes past eleven her Majesty, accompanied by the Prince, entered the carriage, amidst the most lively demonstrations of affection and loyalty from the multitudes assembled on the bridge above and around the station below, as well as from the assemblage of ladies who were accommodated with an advantageous position on the opposite side.

At twenty-five minutes past eleven the train started, and the cheering was most enthusiastic, being prolonged until after her Majesty had proceeded some distance.

The above-named directors accompanied the Queen along the line. The train arrived at Bourne at twenty-one minutes to twelve, and the distance between that and Tring was performed in thirty-two minutes. At both these places, as well as at intervals along the side of the road, crowds of persons were collected, who greeted her Majesty with hearty cheers.

At Leighton Buzzard station there was a vast concourse of people Flags were suspended by the wayside, and the crowds assembled cheered her Majesty very enthusiastically as she passed along; but as the train went at the rate of five-and-twenty miles an hour, it may be supposed that the whole ebullition of loyalty was confined to the concentrated efforts of a few moments.

Wolverton was reached at twenty-one minutes after twelve o'clock. At this station, arrangements had been made, as before, to have been arranged that her Majesty should partake of lunch at this point of the journey. The platform was covered with crimson cloth, and an apartment especially devoted to the use of the Queen was handsomely decorated for the occasion. A vast number of persons were admitted within the station for the purpose of witnessing the arrival of the train. The directors here conducted the Queen and the Prince Consort to the apartment above alluded to, where her Majesty partook of coffee and other refre-hments. In less than five minutes her Majesty was again seated in the carriage. Up to the point of the journey, several trains had met the Royal party, whose visit seems to have been fully anticipated, inasmuch as by the waiting of ladies' handkerchiefs and other tokens, the presence of royalty was acknowledged by all. The country below Wolverton presented a singular appearance in many parts, where the waters were not considerably.

The approach to Weedon was announced by the sound of martial music, which was heard even above the noise of the engine, and the rumbling thunder of the train. Weedon being a military station, additional facilities were afforded, and the authorities seized on them to afford her Majesty a brilliant reception—perhaps the most striking on the whole line. A standard waved from the church-steeple on the right as the train approached the station, and on the left salutes were fired from the barracks. Along the whole length of the station troops (the 64th), lined the roadside. As the train came up they presented arms to her Majesty, and the band played the national anthem. Flags with loyal inscriptions, "Victoria, England's hope," "God save the Queen," and so on,—waved on either side of the way, and the music of the band met a not inappropriate accompaniment in the enthusiastic cheering of the assembled multitudes. The military were under the command of Colonel Stretton, with whom his Royal Highness Prince Albert for a few moments conversed. The Royal standard waved from the top of the station. Her Majesty remained at Weedon about four minutes, while water was taken in the engine. The lapse of time afforded ample opportunity to the people and the military to express their loyal satisfaction at her presence among them.

The train arrived at Weedon at 14 and left it at 18 minutes past 1, proceeding at the rate—an average, including stoppages—of 25 miles an hour towards Crick and Rugby.

At Crick there was a vast concourse of people, who heartily cheered the Queen.

At Rugby the train arrived at forty-two minutes after one. Here the royal standard was displayed, and crowds of people were collected, who cheered most enthusiastically. At Brandon there were similar demonstrations.

The stately spires of Coventry next came in view, and it is no exaggeration to state, that at this point of the road ten thousand persons must have been assembled. For upwards of two miles, the line on each side was thronged with a multitude of spectators, who testified their loyal affection by every possible means as the train glided by. This was the climax of the affectionate welcome with which her Majesty was greeted at every point.

Proceeding onwards, the royal cortége reached Hampton station, where the Derby junction diverges from the Birmingham line, at twenty minutes past two o'clock, thus performing the distance between Watford and Hampton, 84¾ miles, in exactly three hours, including stoppages. Her Majesty here expressed herself highly gratified with all the preparations that had been made for her accommodation by the directors of the London and Birmingham Railway Company.

At this point the directors of the Derby line, among whom we observed Sir Oswald Moseley, Mr. Walker, Mr. D. Ledsam, and Mr. Beales met her Majesty, and the locomotive engine Burton, belonging to the latter company, supplying the place of that which had brought the train thus far, in less than five minutes the royal tourists were on their way to Tamworth under the guidance of Mr. Keightley, the resident engineer of the line. This portion of the journey, fifteen miles, calls for no remark, beyond the fact, that the distance was performed in twenty minutes, the royal carriage being brought to a stand at the Tamworth station precisely at a quarter to three o'clock.

ARRIVAL OF HER MAJESTY AT TAMWORTH.

On the instant the train was hailed from the castle, the royal standard, presented for the occasion by Lord Charles Townshend, was hoisted from the turret, and a royal salute announced the arrival of her Majesty. Her Majesty alighted from her magnificent carriage, and was escorted to a beautiful pavilion, most tastefully erected and carpeted for the reception of her Majesty and her Royal Consort. At twenty minutes to three o'clock the Right Honourable Sir Robert Peel arrived at the station, accompanied by his son, Mr. Robert Peel; and amongst those under the pavilion were the Honourable E. Peel, Captain Pye, Captain Dyott, C. Harding, Esq., Rev. Robert Taylor, Rev Dr. Lally, Lord Talbot, Lord Ingestre, and a number of distinguished ladies and gentlemen of the neighbourhood. Her Majesty and Prince Albert and the royal party were received by Sir Robert Peel, to whom she bowed graciously, saying—"A very fine day, Sir Robert," and then proceeded down a newly-constructed flight of wooden stairs, elegantly covered and carpeted; and having entered the royal carriage, she drove slowly out of the yard, and was escorted into the town by three troops of the Tamworth Yeomanry Cavalry, under the command of Colonel Monckton, commander of the regiment, Major Peel, and Major Majendie. The moment her Majesty's carriage passed out of the yard to the station road, the immense multitude raised a most enthusiastic shout, and amidst the most hearty welcome, waving of hats and handkerchiefs, she proceeded at a slow pace along the road to the commencement of the borough, where a platform was erected on the right hand side for the accommodation of the Mayor and Corporation. Her Majesty was received by the Mayor and the members of the body corporate. The Mayor presented to her Majesty the mace, saying, "I deliver to your Majesty the mace;" to which the Queen replied, handing it back again, "Take it; for it cannot be in better hands." After a short stoppage, the royal cortége proceeded up George-street, Market-street, and, by way of Bone-hill, to Drayton Manor. Every house-top, window, and public building from which a view could be gained, was occupied by those anxious to obtain a sight of her Majesty. The streets were well kept by the yeomanry and Staffordshire police, and the utmost order prevailed. The town presented a most animated appearance.

The procession, in the order described, arrived at Drayton Manor at about half-past three, where she was received by Lady Peel and a number of distinguished ladies.

The Mayor presented loyal and dutiful addresses to her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, which were most graciously received.

Sir Robert Peel rode on the left side of the Queen's carriage through the town from the station. The town was illuminated at night, and everything that could be was done to do honour to the illustrious visitors.

At half-past five the eleven o'clock train from London arrived, bringing his Grace the Duke of Wellington and the newly elected Bishop of Lichfield, who were invited to join the royal circle at Drayton. The same train brought down the Duke of Rutland, who took the Midland Counties line at Rugby, and went to Belvoir Castle to prepare for the reception of the Queen.

It is a remarkable fact, that although her Majesty's progresses have usually been at a season of the year when bad weather may usually be expected, she has always been either so fortunate, or so favoured, as to have fine days of sunshine and balmy breezes in place of lowering clouds or cutting winds, or, worse than all, November rain. On the present occasion the weather was most auspicious throughout the journey.

On her Majesty's arrival at Drayton Manor on Wednesday, she was received at the entrance of the mansion by Lady Peel, and was immediately attended to her private apartments, where her Majesty and the Prince partook of lunch.

Dinner was served precisely at eight o'clock, and covers were laid for 21.

Amongst the guests who had the honour of dining with her Majesty were the Duke of Wellington, the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, the Duke of Rutland, Mr. Robert Peel (eldest son of the Prime Minister), Lady Portman, Earl Talbot, Archdeacon Lonsdale, the Bishop of Lichfield elect, Lady Jane Peel, the Hon. Miss Paget, Gen. Wemyss, Colonel Bouverie, Mr. Anson, the Mayor of Tamworth (Mr. Bramall), Lieutenant Colonel Monckton, and John Shaw Manly, Esq., the High Sheriff of the County.

After dinner her Majesty retired to the Library, in which room, as well as in the adjoining rooms, are many of the chef d'œuvres of modern art in painting and sculpture, which her Majesty spent some time in admiring.

Her Majesty retired to rest shortly after eleven o'clock.

The Bishop (elect) of Lichfield left Drayton Manor shortly before eleven o'clock in the carriage of Mr. Edmund Peel, the Premier's brother, for the seat of that gentleman.

On Wednesday morning her Majesty breakfasted at eight precisely in her own private apartments.

At half past nine Prince Albert, attended by General Wemyss, Colonel Bouverie, and Mr. Anson, started from Drayton Manor for the Tamworth station, in order to proceed to Birmingham, for the purpose of inspecting some of the most remarkable features of that great manufacturing town.

An account of his progress we have elsewhere given.

At eleven o'clock her Majesty went out to walk, accompanied by Lady Peel, the Duchess of Buccleuch, and Miss Paget. Her Majesty walked on the terrace, and afterwards visited Lady Peel's flower-garden, and the farmyard and dairy. Her Majesty remained, apparently much enjoying the fine weather, until nearly twelve o'clock.

Her Majesty the Queen Dowager arrived at the Tamworth station at three o'clock, by a special train, accompanied by Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, Earl Howe, and the Countess of Brownlow. Sir Robert Peel left Drayton soon after two o'clock, and proceeded to the Tamworth station, where he received her Majesty the Queen Dowager, who proceeded, accompanied by the Premier and her suite, and escorted by the Staffordshire Yeomanry, immediately to Drayton Manor.

In the afternoon a dinner took place in the Town Hall, Tamworth, to commemorate the occasion of her Majesty's visit. The Mayor, corporation, and principal inhabitants were present.

At the Royal dinner party, on Wednesday evening, there were the following additional guests:—The Queen Dowager, the Prince of Saxe Weimar, the Countess Brownlow, Mr. C. N. Newdegate, M.P. for West Warwickshire, the Earl of Warwick, Viscount Ingestre, the Right Hon. W. Y. Peel, and the Dean of Lichfield.

The invitations for Thursday comprised, besides those of the above, who are Sir Robert's guests for the period of her Majesty's stay, the Earl of Stamford, the Earl of Dartmouth, Mr. Watts Russell and Mr. Adderley, the members for North Staffordshire; Captain A'Court and Sir Francis Lawley.

On Thursday morning Prince Albert was to go out at a very early hour to shoot. He was expected to return to lunch at two, and at half-past two her Majesty and the Prince, accompanied by several of the most distinguished guests, proceed to Lichfield, where they were to visit the cathedral. Yesterday morning, at eleven, her Majesty would depart from the station at Tamworth for Chesterfield, which she was to reach at one. At the Chesterfield station the Duke of Devonshire would be in readiness to receive her Majesty, who would proceed in his Grace's own carriage to Chatsworth, which she was expected to reach at two o'clock.

In the emblematical border, on the preceding page, the arms on the right are those of the Duke of Devonshire; and those on the left, of the Duke of Rutland; whilst the arms beneath the view of Drayton Manor, are those of Sir Robert Peel. At the picturesque arch at Tamworth, the Mayor presented the mace to her Majesty, as before described.

VISIT OF PRINCE ALBERT TO BIRMINGHAM.

On Wednesday last his Royal Highness Prince Albert visited this busy line of manufacturing industry. From the moment it was announced that his Royal Highness intended visiting Birmingham, the most intense anxiety was evinced by all parties to testify their loyalty to the Queen by welcoming their representative for her Illustrious Consort. Meetings of the corporation and inhabitants were held on Monday, and resolutions passed to present an address to his Royal Highness. Tuesday the town was extensively placarded with bills, announcing the resolutions agreed to, and setting forth the route it was intended his Royal Highness should take. The Royal Lancers, under the direction of Colonel Thorn, the commander of the district, were put under orders to meet and escort his Royal Highness to the station this morning. The police and constables were ordered for duty at the station and throughout the town, and every thing which could be done was resorted to, to pay honour to the Queen's Consort. On Wednesday morning Thomas Weston, Esq., accompanied by the members of the town council, proceeded to the Derby station, where preparations were made to receive his Royal Highness. The directors of the line admitted by ticket a large number of the most respectable inhabitants, and the station, which is most extensive, had a most animated appearance. A company of the 83rd Regiment of Foot, stationed in the town, were drawn up on the platform where the Prince was to alight, and within a few yards of them were Thomas Weston, Esq., Mayor, several Aldermen, and most distinguished inhabitants of Birmingham.

Precisely at twenty minutes to eleven o'clock a flag was hoisted, announcing the approach of the royal train, and instantly the soldiers presented arms, and his Royal Highness, accompanied by Mr. Anson and Colonel Bouverie, alighted, and was received by the Mayor, who presented him with an appropriate address.

His Royal Highness, in a low tone, replied to the Mayor, observing that he felt deeply grateful for the address presented to him by the Mayor. He could assure him he felt a warm interest in the manufactures of Birmingham, and should, he had no doubt, receive great pleasure in inspecting some of their distinguished works. His Royal Highness then proceeded along the platform, amidst the cheering of those in the station. He soon reached the outer door leading to the yard where the Royal carriages were drawn up. His Royal Highness entered, and took his seat with the Mayor, Mr. Anson, and Col. Bouverie. The Lancers were here in attendance, and having arranged themselves as a guard of honour, the royal cortége drove off amidst the hearty shouts of the great multitude assembled.

The moment his Royal Highness was recognised near Lawley-street, great cheering took place, and was caught up by the immense mass of persons who lined the street, and occupied every window and house-top from which a view could be obtained. His Royal Highness appeared delighted with the enthusiasm of the people, and with his usual suavity of manner and dignity bowed most graciously. At the top of Lawley-street, and when near the extensive glass manufactory of Messrs. Bacchus and Sons, the Lancers drew up on each side of the street, and the royal carriages drove up to the door of the above establishment, where his Royal Highness was received by the proprietors, and conducted through their extensive establishment, where the processes of glass-blowing, glass-pressing, and glass-cutting, were being carried on in every variety of pattern and design. The whole was regarded by his Royal Highness with great interest and admiration.

His Royal Highness then left these works, and proceeded along Prospect-row, Coleshill-street, Dale-end, Bull-street, and Snow-hill, and, as he passed along, was most warmly cheered by the vast crowds who were, at this point, in such dense masses, that many of them fell down, and were trampled upon by their companions; but, fortunately, no one was seriously injured, although the pressure was dreadful. His Royal Highness soon arrived at the important concern belonging to Messrs. Muntz, Water-street, where Mr. Philip Henry Muntz received and conducted him through the establishment. The great article of manufacture here is the patent yellow metal. This Royal Highness was first shown the metal in its liquid state, taken from the furnace, and cast in pigs; next, the process of heating it. The solid mass, while in this state, was subjected to the operation of powerful rollers, turned by immensely powerful steam machinery. The flattened bars, having been taken from the rollers, were again subjected to the heat of the furnace, and once more passed under the rollers; and in this way, by four operations, this shapeless mass was converted into a fine sheet of metal, cut by circular shears into the required lengths, and prepared for sheathing shipping, for which it is particularly manufactured.

After inspecting these works, a short drive brought the Prince to the extensive paper maché manufactory of Messrs. Jennings and Bettridge, Constitution-hill, where he was received in the most cordial manner by the spirited proprietors, who conducted him through their extensive works. His Royal Highness paid particular attention to the process of enamelling, inlaying with pearl, and the process of painting, which are carried on in separate rooms. His Royal Highness seemed much struck with the great variety of purposes to which the manufacture was applied.

His Royal Highness having now left the above manufactory, proceeded through Henrietta-street to Charlotte-street, to the works of Messrs. Elkington and Co., where electro-plating is carried on, to a great extent, and brought to the highest perfection. His Royal Highness, after examining several articles, proceeded to the gun and sword manufactory of Messrs. Sargent, where the new process of rolling gun-barrels, and turning and boring them by steam-machinery, is carried on.

The next establishment visited was the gilt and silver plated manufactory of Mr. E. Armfield, Newhall-street. Here his Royal Highness was received by Mr. Armfield, who conducted him to the different rooms where the men were at work. During the visit of his Royal Highness to the above places he was met by a great number of highly respectable ladies, who occupied every inch of ground in the various manufactories from which a view could be obtained of his Royal Highness.

His Royal Highness was conducted by his equerries and the mayor, J. Scholefield, Esq., M.P. for the borough, Colonel Thorn, and James Taylor, Esq., through all the above establishments. He seemed, on the whole, highly delighted and surprised at the stupendous works which he witnessed. His Royal Highness, having visited Messrs. Sargent's gun manufactory, where he was received with a discharge of musketry, proceeded to visit the Town-hall and the Free Grammar-school, where he had refreshment with the Rev. Mr. Lee. After partaking of the hospitality of the governors, his Royal Highness was ushered into the classical school, where addresses were presented to him from the governors—one addressed to her Majesty the Queen, and the other to his Royal Highness, by whom they were graciously acknowledged. Prince Albert was then shown the commercial school, and the arrangements of this splendid foundation were explained to his Royal Highness by the head master and governors. After entering the playground, the Prince was received with a joyous, hearty cheer by several hundred of the boys belonging to the elementary schools, who, by the kind forethought of Mr. Lee, were thus favoured with an opportunity of seeing his Royal Highness.

There were a few ladies admitted to the Town-hall galleries, but the entire space of the hall was left vacant for his Royal Highness to have full views of the building. Mr. Simson, the organist, played the national anthem and "Luther's Hymn." His Royal Highness then inspected the School of Medicine, the Free Grammar School, and the Proof House, where he was received with a discharge of musketry and large guns. His Royal Highness then drove to the railway station, where he had arrived in the morning, and took leave of the engineer, Manager, who had come from her residence to accompany him to Drayton. The royal party then started amidst the renewed, continued, and enthusiastic cheering of all those who had been favoured by admission to the station, and who could not but feel highly delighted with the great courtesy of his Royal Highness. The inhabitants have done great credit to themselves. The newly-elected Mayor has won golden opinions from all parties, and has been most warmly cheered in addresses to the Prince and his party; and not from the lips of one of the many thousands who were assembled, did there proceed any other than expressions of respect and loyalty.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

On Monday last a new opera was produced at this house, entitled, "The Bohemian Girl," the libretto by Bunn, the music by Balfe. The story is closely adapted from the ballet of the "Gipsey," which was produced at Her Majesty's Theatre about four years ago, with Fanny Elsler as the heroine. The author of the piece has wisely transferred the scene of action from Scotland to Hungary. Scotia is too familiar to us, besides "quæ è longinquo magis placent." The story of MM. de St. George's and Mazziller, selected the Queen of Charles II.—the author of the present drama has taken a corresponding period in the history of Poland. Thaddeus (the name, no doubt, suggested by Miss Porter's novel), is an exiled Pole, who, to screen himself from his pursuers, joins a band of gipsies, and subsequently assists himself into a certain Count's favour by saving his beloved child from the fury of a hunted stag. This child, in the very moment of thanksgiving for her safety, is, for no very evident reason, stolen by one of the gipsies, Devilshoof, and thus ends act the first. An interval of twelve years is supposed to take place between the first and second acts, when the little Perdita appears—and a charming gipsey too was she, as represented by Miss Rainforth. She is very gratefully in love with the preserver of her life, and is betrothed, or we may say married to him, by the ceremony of the gipsey queen's ritual. This queen, be it known, entertains a secret passion for the Pole herself, and by an artifice contrived to get his "devoted" arraigned of theft and brought before the Count, who is chief personage in this district. This is as lucky as things could be. "A consummation devoutly to be wished for," ensues in the handsomest manner possible, and the little gipsey girl, Arline, is found out to be the long-lost child of the sorrowing Count. As, however, "the course of true love never yet" ran smoothly, there occur several very necessary obstacles to the total comfort of all parties, which, however, are satisfactorily removed at length; and the exiled Pole, Thaddeus, having proved himself worthy of an alliance with the house of Count Arnheim, receives his daughter in a splendid way, accompanied by her parents' benison. The poor queen of the gypsies, by the way, gets shot, to give the finale a touch of the pathetic, and the whole winds up with a determination on the part of everybody to be as happy as they can.

"In the full bloom of womanhood array'd"

Balfe's music to this opera is by no means worthy of the praise of originality. It is well instrumented in general (although we must object to so much of that tee-a tee-a tee-a accompaniment, the bane of passage), but he has been a little too free with some of his contemporaries. The overture has not sufficient distinctness of design about it. —It is too restless, and may be called, in the strict sense of the word, a medley. In the concerted pieces the composer's genius appeared to greater advantage than in other portions of his work—frequently exhibiting combinations and treatments which could not occur to any but a legitimate musician. The ensemble reflects the highest credit upon its author, and shows to the public that here is one secure from "naturalizing useless foreigners to the injury of ourselves." The singers are worthy of the highest and most complimentary notice. Miss Rainforth, as Arline, was artlessly perfect (what is seldom to be met with), and Harrison! by what magic has he become suddenly the best English tenor we have got? We know not, but he sang divinely. Stretton, too, was most admirable, and Borrani left us nothing to regret (in the absence of Phillips), but afforded, on the contrary, a satisfaction that was universally felt and rewarded. The scenery, decorations, properties, &c., were of the most extravagant degree of luxe—nothing perhaps ever exceeded the gorgeous "mise en scene" of this national opera: and nothing, perhaps, can be a more illustrative proof of the fact, that when proper fare or food is provided for the English appetite, it is received with more wholesome avidity than the "immania monstra" of foreign cookery, which it is so often forced to swallow against its will. The opera has proved highly successful, the house being crowded every night since its production.

PRINCESS'S

On Monday a new farce in one act by Moncrieff, entitled "Borrowing a Husband," was performed at this theatre with complete success. The plot is simple but ingenious, and may be told in a few words. Pamela (Mrs. Keeley), the wife of Gilbert Buckthorn (Mr. Keeley), learns that she has been left £100 by her godmother, Lady Delacourt, which sum is to be paid to her on presenting herself and husband at the mansion, or "Manor-house" as it is called, of her deceased ladyship's son, Sir Vivian Delacourt (Mr. W. Lacy). This it is found difficult to manage, as unfortunately Gilbert is subpœnaed on a trial some miles off on the unalterable day. But the hundred pounds must be had some how or other; so, at the suggestion of Dame Partington, (Madame Sala), Alec (Mr. Oxberry), Gilbert's cousin, is made to counterfeit the husband, and personate him during his absence at the trial. This office is very agreeably undertaken by Alec in consequence of an old penchant that he entertains for Pamela. They arrive at the manor-house, where, notwithstanding all he would have believed to the contrary, Sir Vivian has not the heart or the virtue to withstand the charms of the pretty villager. A variety of embarrassing situations take place, which are considerably heightened by the unexpected arrival of Gilbert, "the real Simon Pure," who, in consequence of the trial being postponed, returns home, and follows his wife and her borrowed spouse to Sir Vivian's, where, between jealousy of his cousin, and even of the Baronet himself, and the dread of losing the hundred pounds by an imprudent disclosure of the real state of the case, poor Gilbert is in a sad dilemma. This is ridiculously heightened by an arrangement that the apparent man and wife are not to be separated for the night, but to occupy the same apartment, while the true husband is condemned to occupy a dog kennel. He becomes as furious as he dare be under the circumstances, but is appeased by his little wife, who appoints a meeting with him in the sleeping gallery at midnight. This, unfortunately, is overheard by Fryby (Mr. Higgie), the baronet's valet, who informs his master of the assignation, a circumstance that the "would-be" virtuous baronet resolves to take advantage of. The meeting accordingly takes place, and one of those conventional stage absurdities permits Sir Vivian to be very loving with Pamela, when Gilbert, who cannot bear his vile durance any longer, rushes in the worse for the "wear and tear" of two canine gaolers that had been set upon him, when an eclaircissement ensues to the satisfaction of all parties. The Keeleys acted inimitably; and Oxberry, as Alec, was also most excellent. There is not much wit, or even humour in the dialogue, but the situations are comic to a degree, and no doubt that "Borrowing a Husban I" will long continue to be a public favourite. The revived vaudeville, "The Swiss Cottage," was afterwards produced (first time at this theatre), and terminated the entertainments of the night.

On Wednesday evening a new operatic piece, in two acts, was produced for the first time, under the title of "The Flower of Lucerne," the music by C. E. Horn. The story of this drama is but another version of Mackenzie's now hackneyed "Louisa Venoni." "Clari, the Maid of Milan,"—"Linda de Chamouni,"—"The Pearl of Savoy," and a hundred others, id genus omne, have we seen, usque ad nauseam. Eugenie Prosper, as the betrayed daughter, and Barnett, as the broken hearted father, in fact, as Clari and Rolano, were exquisite in what they had to do, but it was not enough for their great powers. The music, as Horn's music always must be, is extremely pretty; but we should like to see his undoubtedly great genius employed upon a subject more worthy of its exercise. "The Flower of Lucerne" may probably continue in bloom till near Christmas.

"ABROAD AND AT HOME."

SIR HENRY BISHOP.—We regret to learn that the health of this distinguished composer is so much impaired, as to render it impossible for him to attend to his duties of Professor of Music in the Edinburgh chair—which honourable situation he has been compelled, in consequence, to resign. There is nothing known, as yet, with regard to the choice of his successor.

WESTMINSTER PLAYS.—Monday, the 11th, Thursday, the 14th, and Monday, the 18th, are the dates fixed for the performance of Terence's "Phormio;" with a prologue and epilogue on the latter occasions.

NEW MUSIC.

HANDEL'S ORATORIO of DEBORAH, arranged for the Organ or Pianoforte (with Vocal Score), by G. Perry. Surman, Exeter-hall, Strand.

We rejoice to see a really good edition of this splendid work; Mr. Perry brings a reverence as well as an affection for the "mighty master of all sound" to his task, which saves him from the crime of desecrating (by interpolations of his own, as other arrangers or *dis*arrangers have done,) what the giant of song had left perfect. We speak of the fidelity with which he has compressed the accompaniments (which in an organ or pianoforte score is the present published form. Of his orchestral additions to the grand maestro's partition we shall speak more anon. Mozart wrote additional orchestral parts to "The Messiah," and afterwards repented of it—but his learning was too obtrusive on the simple grandeur of Handel's early constructions; it was like adorning (?) an Egyptian pyramid with the entablature of a Grecian column. Perry's, on the other hand, are simply interpretative, and are only what George Frederic himself would have done had he lived these days of instrumental perfection. The work is beautifully got up, and ought to be found in the musical library of every body who reverences the "sublime and beautiful" in music. As we promised before, we, deo volente, shall give a more detailed account of this great work on its next performance.

THE FAVOURITE AIRS in PERROT'S Grand Ballet of," Ondine, or La Naiade," arranged for the Piano Forte, by the composer, CESARE PUGNI. Ollivier, New-Bond-street.

Every lover, of the "Poetry of Motion" must have already seen or heard this new ballet, and we write to inform many that "Ondine," and every body capable of enjoying sweet sounds must have been equally delighted with its music, the composition of Signor Pugni. No doubt the pleasure it afforded in its orchestral shape, has induced the author to put it into its present more familiar form.—Ever those who publicly enjoyed it for their pleasure, may privately study and practise it for their benefit. It is simple yet learned -gracefully free, but counter-pointed well -for the most part musique dansante, which is as it should be, but here and there, particularly in the slower movements, there is a pleasant strain of cantabile, for instance, in the celebrated Pas de l'Ombre. Music should never be written with any other view than to give pleasure, and the composition of this ballet is not regard in impartine it. We recommend it to young piano forte players, as a work calculated to improve their taste and enlarge their knowledge.

FANTASIA FOR THE PIANOFORTE on Themes from Spohr's opera, "Jessonda," composed, &c., by Samuel Stone. Ransford.

This fantasia is tastefully and carefully arranged; the few faults that occur in it are more attributable to Herr Spohr than to Mr. Stone, for no great musician (and great he undoubtedly is) ever indulged so wilfully in false notation (or, more technically, false relation) than the author of "Jessonda."

BOYHOOD OF NELSON

To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

SOUTHTOWN, GREAT YARMOUTH, Nov. 25,

AS every circumstance relating to the history of Nelson is deeply interesting to you, and most importantly valuable to me, you will greatly oblige by supplying the link wanting in what great man's name, as it is said of the late Mr. Nash, "is your eminently useful and popular paper, that Nelson was sent to the High School at Norwich, &c., whereas, his first school was at Downham Market, kept by Mr. Noaks, which seminary was recommended to Captain Maurice Suckling, R.N., by my father, Captain M. P. Manby, a great friendship having been formed between them on service, I think it was at the taking of Quebec; in confirmation of which friendship, young Nelson used often to come to my father's residence at Denver, one mile from Downham, accompanying me home on a Saturday, and returning with me to school on the Monday. Yours, &c

GEORGE W. MANBY, Captain, F.R.S.

[Our correspondent will perceive that the account of Nelson's boyhood, in our last number, is in the great commander's own words.—ED.]

THE MUSICAL BIJOU FOR 1844. D'ALMAINE AND CO.

This is a most splendidly produced work, reflecting alike the highest credit on the liberality of the proprietor, and the artistical skill of those whom he has employed in its illustrative departments, which are superb and costly in the extreme. We have never seen anything so beautiful in a work of this kind as the three first designs which adorn this publication. The first on the cover, like the gate of Al Hambra, is but a faint promise of the splendours to which it opens the way. The second, "The Rose of Raby," is exquisite; and the third, an Italian scene, inclosed in a most gorgeous frame, the double work, of taste and ingenuity, is certainly a superlative production of art.

Independent of these merits, this Album of Music and Poetry presents some charming instances of each by some of our most popular composers and writers, and altogether forms a volume of lyric excellence beyond what is usually to be met with. We do not altogether approve of adapting words to such morceaux of instrumental composers' works as happen to be a little cantabile. For instance, we never could receive the motivo, marked Clementi, in any other shape than that in which it first appeared. But this is a trifling objection. The quadrilles, valses, marches, &c., at the end of the book, no doubt will meet its popularity, there being several arrangements by the redoubtable Jullien, and other composers, celebrated in this style of music. Altogether, we recommend this elegant work to our musical readers, assuring them that it is what it professes to be, Un Bijou.

OH! SHALL WE NE'ER SING, LOVE? Ballad. The words by MRS. E. THOMAS; the music by MISS MARIA WRIGHT HAWKES. Hill and Co.

A melody, consisting of some rational snatches prettily strung together, and harmonized secundum artem. We recommend the fair authoress of the words not to disyllabicate "violets"—vi'lets is "a vile phrase."

YES, ALL IS PAST. Ballad. The words written by C. F. W. The music composed by A. L. KELLER. D'Almaine and Co.

This is an unpretending trifle, including a graceful melody and musician-like harmony, with the exception of one or two unimportant errors, that, perhaps, it would be hypercriticism to carp at. Its simplicity and moderate compass cannot fail to render it popular.

LITERATURE.

SYLVESTER SOUND, THE SOMNAMBULIST. Part II.—The second number of this humorous work is, as we anticipated, even more entertaining and laughter-exciting than the first. It is altogether an excellent number, and one which now convinces us that "SYLVESTER SOUND" will be one of the best work of the day. There is nothing in it stranger, forced, or laboured; a stream of humour flows freely throughout. While reading it, we laugh in spite of ourselves; we are compelled to laugh, but now that we are on the subject of laughter we will give the author's episode on that which he terms

THE FATOXEYED.

The pagans had a little swell when they called the god of laughter. His name was COMUS, and he was fat, as a perfectly natural matter of course. He didn't do much they who laugh much, very seldom do—but, notwithstanding, in his day he was popular among the pagans. Very good. Now, there are, of course, various species of laughter. There's the natural laugh, the hysterical laugh, the hypocritical laugh, and the laugh of the blind; but the natural laugh is the only laugh which springs absolutely from pleasure. COMUS had a natural laugh, and he was, therefore, fat. Why, what an immense fund does this open for the philanthropist to contemplate! COMUS—who wasn't a fool—didn't—as CASSIUS, because he was lean. If this and that he put together, to what will they amount? MONUS—not COMUS, but MONUS—censured NOTICUS, for making a man without a window in his breast, that his designs and characters might be seen, which we all very well; but what necessity, even in that rootie age, would there have been for this window, had a social and political FATOXEYED existed? And how infinitely more valuable would it be now—how society would be simplified by virtue of its introduction! Fat is the natural fruit of laughter; natural fruit of natural springs from natural pleasure; pleasure is derived from happiness: happiness from goodness, and goodness comprehends all the virtues. That is one side of the question: now look at the other. Who ever saw a really laughing-loving MAN fat? NONE. And why? Because laughter opens the shoulders—expands the chest—strengthens and increases the size of the lungs, and thus generates fat. Leanness, then, denotes the absence of laughter; the absence of laughter the absence of pleasure; the absence of pleasure, the absence of happiness; the absence of happiness, the absence of goodness; and the absence of goodness, the absence of all the virtues. Who had they been contemporaries—who would not have trusted DANIEL LAMBERT—a man of one-dozen's-know-how-many stone—in preference to MONSIEUR—what was his name—the thinnest skeleton? LET A LAUGHTER be established, that the amiable fat need may be caressed, and the treacherous lean ones avoided! Let a standard of fat be fixed, and, as our MONUS and designing can never hope to reach it, so—so will he fall into error.

The episodes in this work are certainly the best things of the kind we ever read. They are what we should term comically-sublimated essays, containing gems of profundity brought to the surface to be laughed at. Here is, for instance, the one which occurs immediately after the strains of MULKINS placed there of course by the SOMNAMBULIST—are found in the pickle-tub, on

PATIENCE.

What an odd inable attribute is patience! How sweet are its influences—how softening its effects! In the hour of affliction, how beautiful, how calm, how serene, how sublime a patience! Behold the afflicted, racked with pain, from which death alone can relieve them. By what can they support themselves but by patience? Patience alone springs from faith and hope! Patience, ever lovely, shows loveliest then. But who ever met with passive patience encountering with active suspense? We may endure silicons the most poignant with patience —but we cannot with patience endure suspense. The knowledge of the worst that can befal us, may be borne with patience—but patience will hold no communion with our ignorance of that worst. Hence we are ardently anxious to know. AUNT EDGARS, for example, but she knows that the emails had been put into the pickle-tub by cook, and that JENKINS had upset the dish, and as she knew that MR. POKEY had no conjuration, or any other gentlemen and his companions, had actually entered the cottage—she would not have been at all astonished with patience; but as she was utterly ignorant of everything connected with the origin of these mysterious proceedings—as she neither knew what had induced them, nor had the power even to guess the cause to which some they could have been fairly ascribed—patience was altogether out of the question. Here we exercised a state of suspense with which patience had nothing whatever to do. Still it was, notwithstanding this, all very well for her reverend friend to recommend it; it was, in fact, his province to do so; for having studied deeply the Book of Job, he held patience to be one of the sublimest virtues. It is true—quite true—that he hasn't much himself. But then look at his position. He had to read two sermons every week of his life; and his sermons were him a guinea per dozen! Such a man could not rationally be expected to have patience. Nay, indeed, have men in general, much. The women are the great models for patience. Hence it is that they are so frequently termed ducks; seeing that, as ducks, when they are sitting, they hatch their eggs a whole month, they are the legitimate emblems of patience. But men are not ducks!

But even when the author is serious he gives us much to reflect upon and to induce thought. For example, here is that which may be said to be

A PICTURE OF LIFE.

Upon those who live in the midst of excitement, who not only feel the world's buffets themselves, but see the world buffeting all around them—whose lives are one perpetual struggle—whose career is a series of ups and downs—who are constantly compelled to be on the qui vive—to rise from repose at night, and from rest to toil, and from toil to rest, overcoming those barriers by which their progress in life is impeded who, either to amass wealth, or to gain a more substantial name, have their minds continually on the stretch—who are surrounded by difficulties springing, not only from honourable competition, but from trickery, malignity, and envy—who are thwarted at every step—who are opposed at every point, and have to dodge through the world, which is to them one huge labyrinth, out of which they scarcely know how to get with honour—troubles of as unimportant caste make but little impression, for they really have not time to think much about them; but they, whose lives are passed in an almost perpetual calm—who live but to live—who have a competence which secures to them comfort—who have nothing but tranquility around them, nothing to prepare for in this world but the next—whose course is clear, whose career is smooth—who experience neither ups nor downs—who live on, and on, in the spirit of peace, hoping for peace hereafter—who know but little of the world's vicissitudes—who have nothing to oppose their progress—no difficulties to surmount, no barriers to break down, no competitors to encounter, no struggling, no straining, no manœuvring—they magnify every cause of vexation by dwelling upon it, brooding over it, and making it the germ of a thousand conceptions, as if anxious to ascertain what monstrous fruit it can thus be imagined to bear.

We have here a well drawn full-length portrait of

A VILLAGE POLITICIAN.

Of all highly-influential men, there is not one more capable of commanding the attention of those who form the circle of which he is the centre, than a village politician. Nor would it be correct if there were, for what a patriot he is!—what a pure philanthropist!—what a bold and fearless indignant man! How profound is his political wisdom!—how boldly he denounces the conduct of the party to whom he is, on principle, opposed! What rogues—what reckless, rampant rogues—does he prove them to be! To his knowledge, what intrigues are they connected with—what flagrant follies are they guilty of—what dead robberies can they be charged with! In his view, with what tenacity do they stick to the vitals of the people!—how they batten on corruption!—how they are on pure pasture!—how richly they deserve to be hanged! With what fiery indignation does he declare them to be heretics!—how eager is he, how vexed, how utterly contemptible does he deem to meet him all appear, when, to get a coat to make, or a boot to mend, he would take off his hat to the first he met.

We would extract one of the scenes which set gravity at defiance, but for that we have not space. We must, therefore, conclude with the following reflections:—

Oh, how easily are we elevated—how easily depressed—and when analysed, what puppets we appear, not always the puppets of others, but frequently our own—acting by virtue of the very strings which we pull—the creatures of the very circumstances of which we are the creators—but at all times puppets. It is strange that the human mind—which is often so powerful in its resistance to oppression, so stout in its adherence to principle, so firm in its pursuit of all that is noble, just, virtuous, and true, should be swayed by mere trifles; yet, while possessing all the elements of strength, so it is. A single word may cause our spirits to rise to wax or to wane. A mere thought of our own may entirely plunge into despair, or place us upon the very apex of hope. A cork at sea is more constant than we are; the under carriage may swell and roll, but it still retains its position on the surface: whereas, we are the sport of every wave—the slightest ripple may upset us. No matter how strong the mind may be, the loftiest, the mightiest, may be wrought upon by trifles. MEN SCALE mountains and stumble over a brick. The sea, in its true, all equally sanguine; but when we are depressed, how soon may we be elated, and how frequently are we, by virtue of viewing the veriest bubbles aloft. Hope can blow. At such a time, that which is nothing per se, may be made to amount to a great deal per saltum.

Such a work as this must become popular.

The Magazines for December, with several new books, will be noticed in our Journal next week.

"THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS" STEAM PRINTING MACHINES.

"THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS" STEAM PRINTING MACHINES.

The gifts to us that boundless Nature in
Her fond maternity has oft bestow'd,
To raise our contemplation, and to win
Our thoughts from earth to more divine abods,
Have come at length, if we dare circumscribe
The power of Providence to such an end,
That further dreaming of "the shadowy tribe," Call'd Man's Ideas, cannot onward tend
To more discovery.—Oh! mysterious pow'r!
For ever sacred be the happy hour
When thou a moral messenger wert sent,
To be the missionary telegraph—
In silence telling what through earth is meant,
From birth of stars to ev'n worms' epitaph!

The readers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS are doubtless aware of the circumstance of two new printing machines, of unusual magnitude and power, having been recently erected for the printing of that paper—a proceeding rendered necessary by the inadequacy of the ordinary printing apparatus to furnish a sufficient number of papers to meet the unprecedented demand for this journal. We have several times intended to explain to our readers the structure and mode of action of these interesting mechanisms; but have refrained until the present time from carrying out that intention, in order that we might do so on the anniversary of a time celebrated in the annals of typography, the first introduction of printing by steam. On November the 28th, 1814, the Times startled its readers with the announcement that the paper they were then reading had been printed by steam power. The machine by which that achievement was accomplished was the invention of a German, of the name of Koenig; but, although it served its purpose, it was still very imperfect. The inking apparatus, in particular, was extremely complicated and uncertain; and after a considerable period of persevering trial, the whole of these complications were removed by Mr. Cowper, and other machinery introduced on a better plan. The success of steam printing dates from the completion of Mr. Cowper's improvements; and since that time, in all cases, where the production of a large number is required, machines, varying more or less from his original type, have become indispensable.

We must now endeavour to make as plain as we can the nature of the mechanism of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS printing machines. There are two separate machines; one for printing one side of the paper, and the other for printing the other. These machines are impelled by a six-horse power steam-engine, of the high pressure variety—that is, the power is that of six horses at the present pressure in the boiler of 25lb. on the square inch; but, by raising the pressure, the power may be proportionately increased. The engine is considered capable of working four machines, if required.

Each machine consists of a great traversing table, supported in an iron framework, and four cylinders, two of mahogany and two of iron; the iron cylinders being underneath the mahogany ones. These cylinders are all truly turned; and a series of endless tapes circulates over each mahogany cylinder and each iron one, for the purpose of carrying the paper. The unprinted paper is placed on a table opposite each of the mahogany cylinders; and the uppermost sheet of the heap being pressed against the cylinder by a boy stationed there for that purpose, is seized and held against the cylinder by a roller of small diameter, placed at the end of a lever—the lever having such a motion given to it by the cam as to seize and release the paper at the right times. The mahogany rollers convey the sheets into the toils of the endless tapes, which, circulating as they do round the iron rollers underneath, carry the paper with them. The type is placed upon the traversing table, the iron rollers being so adjusted as to press upon its surface; and the paper in passing round the iron rollers of course receives the impress of the type. The printed paper is conveyed from the iron rollers by the tapes to a stage above the machine, upon which the tapes deposit it.

The inking of the types is accomplished by means of a roller, revolving in an ink box, at each end of the machine; against which a plate of metal is so placed as to regulate properly the thickness of the film of ink adhering to the roller. Another roller vibrates between this revolving roller, and the inking-table; which inking-table is, in fact, a part of the traversing table which carries the type; and this vibrating roller transfers the ink it receives from the first roller to the inking-table, over the surface of which it is evenly distributed by the aid of several small rollers; these are placed rather obliquely across the table, so as to have, when turned round by their friction on the table, a trivial end travel. The ink is given off the inking-table to two rollers, which lie immediately adjoining the cast-iron cylinder, and underneath which the type passes. These rollers give the ink to the types.

It will be obvious, from what we have stated, that there are two distinct inking apparatus—one at each end of the table, the types being in the middle; and a very little consideration will suffice to shew that the iron cylinders must rise and fall alternately, so that when the one is pressing upon the type the other will not. A movement is, consequently, given, by an eccentric, so as to elevate and depress the rollers alternately; without this expedient, the types, after having given off their ink to the paper, on the one cylinder, would, by passing under the other cylinder without an intermediate supply of ink, produce an imperfect impression. To make the paper register properly, as it is called, or in other words to insure the printing on the one side, being exactly opposite to the printing on the other, the paper is placed upon points on the feeding-board, by which minute holes are made in each sheet; and when transferred to the other machine, to have the reverse side printed, these holes, by being adjusted to corresponding points situated there, preserve the register with exactness. These points, it is necessary to observe, are not stationary on the feeding-board, but are carried by the reverse ends of the levers, which carry the roller that seizes the paper; so that the instant the paper is seized by the cylinder, the points are withdrawn. But for this expedient, the paper would be torn by the points on being dragged forward. The tapes, we may remark, pass in the vacant spaces between the types; so that that the tapes do not touch the types, though they lie on the surface of the paper.

These machines, (constructed by Mr. T. Middleton, of Southwark) work at the rate of 2000 perfect impressions within the hour.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

TAMWORTH CASTLE.

Her Majesty's progress through Tamworth, en route to Drayton Manor, has revived the interest of the royal "tower and town." It is but a small borough on the borders of Staffordshire and Warwickshire, and lies 129 miles from the metropolis by the London and Birmingham Railway to Hampton-in-Arden, and from thence to the Birmingham and Derby Junction Railway.

The town first comes into notice in the time of the Heptarchy; several of the Mercian Kings appear, from the date of charters granted by them, to have had their residence at Tamworth. In the Danish wars a fort was built here in the reign of Edward the Elder (A.D. 913), by his sister Ethelfrida, to whom Shaw ascribes the mound on which the present ruins of the castle stand, but the ruins themselves are of later date. An old ditch, yet visible, called "The King's Dyke," which surrounds the town on three sides, is supposed, by Shaw, to be of yet greater antiquity than the time of Edward. After the conquest, the castle and adjacent territory were granted to Robert Marmion, hereditary champion to the Dukes of Normandy; and subsequently, on the extinction of the male line of his family, in the time of Edward I., passed to the family of Frevile. The castle now belongs to the Marquis Townshend, who resides here

TAMWORTH CASTLE.

From the turret of the castle, on Tuesday last, on the instant the railway train, conveying her Majesty and suite, was hailed, the royal standard, presented for the occasion by Lord Charles Townshend, was hoisted, and a royal salute announced the arrival of the Queen.

On Sunday evening last, while the celebrated Divine, the Rev. R. Montgomery, was preaching at Percy Chapel, Fitzroy Square, one gentleman had his purse taken, and two ladies had their clothes cut and pockets rifled, and another gentleman had his watch taken.

Abatements of 10 per cent. upon rent have been made in Northumberland generally. Mr. Bell, M. P. for the southern division, set the example, and it has been followed by Sir J. E. Swinburne, Bart., of Capheaton; R. S. Surtees, Esq., Hamsterley; Lord Redesdale, A. Askew, Esq., &c.

Lord Douglas, who for some time has been in a very delicate state of health, is now so hopelessly ill, that he is not expected to survive.

The number of open deposit accounts in the Marylebone Savings' Bank is now 15,830, and the amount invested £310,496

The directors of the London and Birmingham Railway, in contemplation of her most gracious Majesty's patronage some time since, commenced the erection of a saloon carriage for the use of the Queen, which the projected visit to the northern counties has somewhat unexpectedly called into service. Its final completion has occupied a number of artists for some days past, and the coup d'œil far exceeds anything of the kind before attempted.

COLOSSAL STATUE OF MR. DRUMMOND.

COLOSSAL STATUE OF MR. DRUMMOND, AT THE EXCHANGE, DUBLIN.

This noble statue of the lamented Under-Secretary of State for Ireland, has just been completed by Mr. Hogan, and placed in the great circular room of the Dublin Exchange. The height of the figure is 8 feet, and that of the supporting pedestal 4 feet; and the material is fine marble. The expence was defrayed by a public subscription of £1200, a large sum in Ireland; but to which Mrs. Drummond, the widow of the deceased Secretary, would have added £1000, if the committee of subscribers would have allowed the statue to have been placed in the National Schools, Marlborough-street; but to this request, as they considered a more public situation desirable, assent was refused; and the statue has, accordingly, been placed in the Exchange. The sum of money which the affectionate lady proposed to devote to the memory of her excellent husband, was, on its refusal by the committee, bestowed on the National Schools, in which establishment Mr. Drummond was warmly interested; and we consider, much as we love the arts, that, under the circumstances, the money could not have been more appropriately expended.

As a work of art the statue takes very high rank, and has added greatly to Mr. Hogan's reputation for portrait sculpture.

The death of Mr. Drummond took place at Dublin, on April 15th, 1840, after four days severe suffering. His loss was deeply deplored, for, in the words of a Correspondent, he was considered "the only good Secretary Ireland had had for many years." Immediately after his decease, the following brief sketch of his career appeared in the Morning Chronicle —

Brought up to a profession (that of engineer) which is, perhaps, beyond any other, daily supplying eminent and efficient service to the public, he early displayed very high and singular attainments; the discovery of a species of light, which bears his name will probably be familiar to many His talents were first made available for direct political objects in the preparation of the calculations and arrangement of the boundaries which were adopted under the Reform Bill He afterwards went through a most laborious period of public service as private secretary to Lord Althorp, whose warm regard and affection will have followed him to his premature tomb. Upon the formation of Lord Melbourne's second Administration, he succeeded Sir William Gosset, as Under Secretary for Ireland, and it is upon the discharge of his duties in that arduous and responsible post during the past five years, that his claims upon the admiration and gratitude of his colleagues and his country will mainly rest. We greatly wish that the devoted and almost chivalrous ardour with which he encountered, and courted, and mastered, the most complicated and various details of business, may not have tasked too heavily a somewhat susceptible frame; we write, however, in the absence of precise medical information, and the actual illness under which he sunk would not seem to have had any necessary connection with previous exhaustion. How great his loss must prove will probably be felt by numbers, especially in that country to whose interests he had unreservedly attached himself, but can only be adequately measured by those who worked with him, or under him; and it is assuredly only they, with the inmates of his own domestic circle, who can at all appreciate the single-minded simplicity and fervour of his character, the unbroken and cheerful sweetness of his temper, and the high minded delicacy of his conscience, from whose clear mirror every image of dishonesty, oppression, or meanness would have shrunk appalled. He has left a widow and three young children. Their sorrows are too sacred for discussion here, and we have only to add that his dying hours accorded strictly with the tenor of his life, and exhibited, amidst protracted suffering and consciousness of danger, the most patient and devout resignation.

It appears from the Observer, that "long before Mr. Drummond was chosen for his truly important office in Ireland, he had become well acquainted with every class of society in that country; conducting the Ordnance Survey of Ireland, he was thrown among her people in her wildest parts—encamped upon her hills, isolated from all other society, he had about him only that peasantry whose character and habits he so well understood, and whose affectionate reminiscences followed him with tears to his early grave."

Mr. Drummond was an indefatigable Fellow of the Royal Society, and his name will ever be identified with Science in her highest walks. We are not aware precisely how far the celebrated oxy-hydrogen and lime, or "Drummond Light," has been applied to lighthouse illumination; but the following letter, obligingly addressed to the writer of this brief sketch, may interest the reader:

Downing street, July 30, 1833

Sir,—In reply to your note, I beg to inform you that the method of illuminating lighthouses proposed by me, has not yet been introduced into the Eddystone or Bel. Rock lighthouses.

No blame is, however, attributable either to the Trinity House, or Mr. Stevenson, on this account. The apparatus must be rendered still more simple before it can be entrusted, with perfect confidence, to the management of the common lighthouse keepers. I had engines to undertake a series of experiments, for this purpose, at the expense of the Trinity House; circumstances, however, occurred to prevent this being done, although I still hope to be able, at no very distant period, to resume the subject.

I am, Sir, your obedient humble servant,

T. DRUMMOND.

We believe that Mr. Drummond's close attention to his official duties alone prevented his completion of this philosophical labour.

DEATH OF ADMIRAL SIR GRAHAM MOORE, G.C.B.—We have to announce the death of the above gallant admiral, at Brook Farm, Cobham, on Friday last, at an advanced age. He was the third son of Dr. Moore, by the daughter of Professor Simpson of Glasgow, and brother to Sir John Moore, who fell at Corunna.

SIR F. W. Macnaghten, Bart., father of the late Sir Wm. Macnaghten, departed this life on Tuesday last, at Bushmill-house, in the County Antrim. Sir Francis was in his 81st year, twenty-one of which he filled the office of Judge in India. His health had been gradually declining since the intelligence reached this country of the death of his son at Cabul, whose melancholy fate is fresh in the minds of us all. No hope was entertained of the life of the venerable Baronet for the last ten days

Sir Lachlan Maclean, M.D., died at Bury last week, in his 81st year. He was created a knight bachelor in 1812, and was seventh son of Dr. Maclean, of the Isle of Skye, who distinguished himself during the year 1745, in defence of the Hanoverian succession. Sir Lachlan had been in practice as a physician for more than half a century.

DEATH OF MR. BENJAMIN WRENCH, COMEDIAN.—This gentleman, for so many years a great public favourite, and in his peculiar walk of the drama unequalled, departed this life on Friday week, at his house in Pickett-place, Strand. He had been confined to his house for the last month, but had rallied considerably under the treatment of his medical adviser. Indeed, a visit to Brighton was suggested to him as late as Tuesday last; but on Friday morning a violent attack of asthma (a complaint he had for years been labouring under) seized him, which terminated in his death the same evening. He was in the 67th year of his age.

CAUTION TO PERSONS MAKING WILLS.—Since the passing of the new Will Act in 1837, numerous wills have been set aside for the want of due attention to the manner of attestations prescribed by that act. Among the latest cases of hardship of this kind, we may mention one that occurred lately in the Prerogative Court. The deceased signed his will in the presence of two witnesses, a man and his wife, present at the same time; but the man having written his wife's name, the Court held that, though the witnesses might have attested the signature of the deceased, they had not both "subscribed" the will, as the Act required, and refused the probate of the will.

THE WATER POWER OF IRELAND.—At the meeting of the Cuivervian Society, at the Royal Cork Institution, a paper was read by Mr. H. Hennessy on the water power of Ireland. The result of his calculation was, that if all the water in the streams and rivers in Ireland were applied to mechanical purposes it would produce a power equal to that of 4,015,230 horses. It was also calculated that the water capable of being applied to chemical uses, as dyeing, tanning, &c., amounts to between four and five billion imperial gallons. That the water of Ireland is pure, and therefore fitted for manufacturing purposes, was proved from various chemical and geological considerations.—Cork Paper.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

WINTER EVENINGS.

There is a joy that fills the breast
When, Nature all in beauty drest,
We wander through a silent wood
And in its quiet solitude
Muse on leaves' or flow'ret's springing
Melancholy birds' lone singing—
Nigntingales their watch beguiling,
'Neath the pensive Moon's sad smiling—
Or a ceaseless Waterfall
That with constancy doth call
On some glen from which for ever
It was forced by Fate to sever—
Cradle of its infant fountain,
Far up in some rocky mountain!

Still no joy is half so dear,
As that about the close of year,
When happy faces congregate
Around a patriarchal grate,
And Summer's wither'd flow'rs retire
To make room for the crackling fire.
Then young and old—rich—poor—agree
It is the time for Revelry!

SERENADE.

I

The Bird of Night hath cess'd her singing—
The early lark hath left her nest—
The Fount of Day-light fresh is springing,
The Moon is red within the West!
The Stars, with all their lovely eyes,
Have, one by one, forsook the skies;
For well they know two brighter spheres
Will soon arise to gild the tears
That Morning sheds o'er leaf and flow'r—
Reveal them, Lady! from thy bow'r!
List—list! it is a Lover's lay
Who in thy smile alone sees Day!

II

My bark since eve has surg'd the billow—
To meet the Sun she did not roam—
The light she sought is on thy pillow—
Oh! send her not in darkness home!
One look of thine will be worth all
The beams that sunshine e'er let fall!
A Maiden's love—lit eyes can show
Much more of Heav'n to Earth below,
In one sweet moment than its spheres
Could bless us with in thousand years!
List! list—it is a Lover's lay
Who in thy smile alone sees Day! W

LANDSLIP AT BRIGHTON.

The annexed engraving, from a sketch by a Correspondent at Brighton, shows the scene of a recent lamentable catastrophe, attended with loss of life. By our Correspondent's circumstantial statement, it appears that at about half-past eleven o'clock on the morning of Wednesday week, a labourer, named Henry Holden, in the employ of Mr. Saxby, of Roedean, was proceeding with another man, George Mockford, to get a load of mangel-wurzel from the land which borders the cliff adjoining the coast-guard station, Blackrock, as shown in our engraving, near the flag-staff; when suddenly a mass of the cliff on which they were walking gave way, and carried the two men with it—one miraculously escaped unhurt, but the other poor fellow was killed on the spot.

The accident was observed by Lieutenant Franklyn, R.N., of the Coast-guard, and one of the coast watchmen, who immediately proceeded to the spot; here, on looking over the cliff, they saw Mockford digging with his hands, apparently to assist Holden, who was buried beneath the loose earth.

No time was lost in obtaining from the station Mr. Johnstone's invaluable invention, the cliff-crane (engraved in No. 43 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS), which being placed on the brink of the chasm, two of the guard and the chief boatman, O'Connor, were let down in the basket with shovels and pickaxe. The deceased was quickly extricated from the fallen mass, and conveyed to the County Hospital, but the vital spark had fled.

VIEW FROM BLACKROCK, BRIGHTON.

Without the cliff-crane it would have been impossible to have rendered the poor fellows any assistance, as the tide was nearly up, and the sea was beating against the base of the cliff, which at this spot is nearly 100 feet in perpendicular height.

On Thursday morning, another mass fell opposite the Brighton Gas Works, as seen at the foot of our engraving; carrying away a portion of the main road, which is now so dangerous that a committee of the parishioners has been formed to wait on the commissioners of the town of Brighton to obtain their assistance in providing some means of protection, as the parish of Rottingdean, in which the spot is situated, is too poor to carry out so vast an undertaking unassisted.

During the night of Saturday, the remains of a hapless sailor were picked up at this spot.

The Hertford Times states, that when her Majesty intimated her intention to honour the Duke of Devonshire with a visit to his magnificent seat at Chatsworth, she expressed a wish that Lord Melbourne should be invited to meet her there. The Noble Viscount will consequently join the party.

The sum of £11,970 has been sold out of the British funds, by direction of the Right Hon. the Paymaster-General of the Forces, for the purpose of securing a plot of land at present contiguous to Chelsea College, but which is to be added to the grounds of that institution. This sum is the residue of the munificent legacy bequeathed in trust by the late Colonel Drouly, formerly captain of Gowes Castle.

On three and a quarter acres of land, on Chatmoss, near Manchester, and only reclaimed some three or four years ago, there has been dug up this season 665 loads of potatoes, of 252lbs each, and equal to 67½ tons, and worth fully 54s per ton. The land is under the superintendence of the guardians of the Manchester union.

Orders have been received at Greenock from Government to give up the Lazarette, or quarantine station at Holy Loch, down the river, after having been in operation there for upwards of 35 years.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

The resolutions passed by a majority of Dissenters in the Town Council of Edinburgh, not to proceed as usual to church with the corporation insignia, has been the subject of much remark in Scotland, and it is said is likely to lead to legal proceedings.

The Queen has subscribed £100, and Prince Albert £50, to the fund now being raised by voluntary contributions for damage done by the terrific hail storm in Gloucestershire, in the county of which many of the poorer classes sustained considerable loss from the devastation caused by the storm. Nearly £3,500 has been contributed to the fund.

The Queen Dowager has given a donation of £30 towards the subscription fund for the erection of the intended new church at Sutherland.

The master and crew of the schooner Margaret, bound from Liverpool to Alexandria, reached that port on the 24th ult, and reported that their vessel had been stranded, on the night of the 20th, on the coast of Africa, about 25 miles to the west of Alexandria. Finding it impossible to get the vessel off, and the armed Arabs assembling about her in great numbers, the master and crew quitted her for their own safety.

There have arrived, at the port of Liverpool, during the week ending Saturday last, 3,500 barrels of flour from the United States; and 900 barrels of flour and 914 quarters of wheat from Canada.

On Friday last, during a trial in some fields near the terminus of the Great Western Railway, the steeple-chase horse Pilot cleared a space of 36 feet 11 inches in a leap over a brook, with a high bank and rail on one side of it, carrying a groom of nine stone, besides the saddle.

A case of defamation was brought before the Sixth Chamber of the Paris Correctional Tribunal last week, in which Mdlle. Rachel was plaintiff, and M. Legallois, the proprietor of a work entitled "Les Actrices Galantes," was defendant. The defendant, through his counsel, having expressed his sorrow for having spoken in improper terms of Mdlle. Rachel, the counsel for Mdlle. Rachel stated that his client was satisfied with this acknowledgment and the Court consented to annul the prosecution.

On Tuesday, the 7th ult, the lands of Menus, part of the estate of the late Thomas Burke, Esq., of Marble Hill, county of Galway, were sold, and sold for £5900. This shows that the value of land has not been depreciated by the unsettled state of the country, for nearly the same sum, about 40 years ago.

The Hon. Colonel George Anson, M.P., was installed as Provincial Grand Master of the Freemasons of the county of Stafford on Tuesday last as successor to the late Earl Ferrers

The Chester Chronicle of Friday states, that although not much more than three months have elapsed since the last sealings, there are already no less than 33 prisoners in Chester Castle, awaiting their trial, and two out, upon bail.

A very mischievous hoax was played off on Thursday last on the scientific and philosophical portion of the public. Cards and printed handbills were sent to the various newspaper offices and to a large number of persons distinguished either by station or scientific lore, requesting the honour of their presence to view a model of the aerial machine, which the proprietor, through the kindness of his friend, Mr. Edmonds, had obtained permission to exhibit at the extensive premises, 58, Conduit street, Regent-street. The result was, that the peaceful premises of the individual thus described were continuously assailed throughout the day by copper-nosed dictators, and unwarranted patrons of mechanical science. The affair turned out to be a hoax. Mr Edmonds was quite unaware of the honour intended for his house, and no doubt would have been glad to escape in an aerial machine for the day to get rid of his importunate visitors.

Letters from Belgrade of the 16th ult. state, that a conspiracy to set fire to it not town had been discovered, and that nine persons attached to the declarated Prince of Servia were arrested in consequence of being in the bottom of the plot.

Fifteen sub-sorters have just been appointed by the Postmaster General at the suggestion of Mr. Rokenham, superintending president of the inland office, for the purpose of facilitating the delivery of foreign and provincial letters in London. The additional cost to the establishment by the adoption of this plan will be £1014 per annum.—[We, ourselves, believe that the Postmaster General does all in his power to improve the arrangements of the office over which he so ably presides.]

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Friday.—A change of wind has brought some of the vessels here that had been detained out, as their samples had been at market previously, there was very little English left on show to-day. The demand, however, was inactive at late rates. In foreign wheat next to nothing was doing. The best barley and malt were quite at dear, but other kinds were unsaleable. The oat trade was active, at full currencies; but all other grain commanded scarcely any attention.

ARRIVALS.—English: Wheat, 2740; Barley, 2730; Oats, 140 quarters. Irish: Oats, [illegible] quarters. Foreign: Wheat, 6230 quarters. Flour (sacks and barrels) 3,300 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 48s to 54s; ditto white, 58s to 62s, Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 42s to 50s; ditto, white, 51s to 57s; rye, 34s to 36s; grinding barley, —s to 28s, distilling, 29s to 30s; malting ditto, 29s to 32s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 55s to 62s; brown ditto, 50s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 56s to 57s; Chevalier, 63s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 17s to 21s; potato ditto, 19s to 23s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; ditto white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s, ditto, old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 30s to 34s; maples, 32s to 34s, harrow ditto, 30s to 34s. Flour, town-made household, 40s to 42s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, 50s to 53s; ditto, red, 50s to 52s; white, —s to —s. In Bond. Barley, 20s; oats, new, 15s to 17s; ditto feed, 14s to 16s; beans, 30s to 32s; peas, 32s to 33s per quarter. Flour, America, 25s to 26s; Baltic, 22s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Canary seed has met a fair demand, at full prices; but, in all other kinds of seeds next to nothing has been doing

THE HOPS.—The present week's transactions—London, English, sowing 36s to 42s; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 45s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 43s to 46s, lumpseed, 38s to 42s per quarter, remainder, 10s to 18s per cwt; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s, white ditto, 12s to 16s 6d; [illegible] to [illegible] Bengal rapeseed, new, £20 to £22s per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £10 to £10 10s; ditto foreign, £7 to £7 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, £5 5s to £5 per ton; canary, 75s to 78s per quarter.

Imperial Weekly Averages.—Wheat, 41s 0d; barley, 32s 1d; oats, 19s 0d; rye, 32s 8d; beans, 32s 6d; peas, 32s 7d.

Imperial Averages of the Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 51s 2d; barley, 31s 7d; oats, 18s 4d, rye, 29s 11d; beans, 31s 8d; peas, 32s 6d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 10s; barley, 7s; oats, 5s; rye, 11s 6d; beans, 10s 6d; peas, as 6d.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 9½d to 9d, of household ditto, 7d to 8d per 4lb loaf.

Tea.—The market for all kinds of tea, this week, has been in a very heavy state, and lower prices have been again accepted for inferior qualities

Sugar.—Fine grades of sugar—which are extremely scarce—are selling readily, at very full rates; but the middling and inferior descriptions may be considered a shade lower.

Coffee.—The demand for Ceylon coffee is inactive, and prices rule somewhat easier. All other kinds are quite as dear.

Rice.—This market is improving, but prices do not improve.

Coals.—Near Tanfield, 14s 6d; Ord's Redheugh, 14s 6d; Gosport, 18s 6d; Hilda, 17s 6d; Newmarch, 17s; Lambton, 16s 6d; Eastfield, 16s 3d; Hetton, 15s 6d per ton.

Hops.—The supply of all kinds of hops continues very limited for the time of year, owing to which the demand is active, and the duration trade ruled dull, at barely late rates. In sales the supply of wrack was moderate, a steady business was done at an advance of from 2s to 4s per 8 lbs., at which the whole were disposed of. The sale for pigs was rather active, and the currencies had an upward tendency. Mitch cows were held at from £16 to £19 10s. Per 8lbs. to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 8d to 3s 8d; second quality ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 2d, prime large oxen, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 8d to 3s 10d; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 10d to 3s 2d; second quality ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; prime coarsewolled sheep, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 4d; large coarse calves, 3s 4d to 3s 10d, prime small ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 4d; large hogs, 3s 0d to 3s 6d; small porkers, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; suckling calves, 19s to 28s; quarter old store pigs, 16s to 22s each. Beasts, 822; cows, 138; sheep, 3960; calves, 167; pigs, 410.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—We had very heavy markets here to-day, on the following terms:—Per 8lbs. by the carcase—Inferior beef, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; middling ditto, 2s 8d to 3s 0d; prime large ditto, 3s 10d to 3s 0d; ditto small ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; large pork, 3s 0d to 3s 6d; inferior mutton, 2s 8d to 3s 0d; middling ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 8d; prime ditto, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; veal, 3s 0d to 4s 2d, small pork, 3s 8d to 4s 0d. ROBERT HERBERT.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

This week, we have again the satisfaction to report still augmenting prospects in commerce generally, and more particularly in the foreign corn trade, which is gradually increasing, chiefly for our colonies and foreign possessions. For the markets in China, likewise, the shipments now making are quite enough at this season of the year to show that the home consumption of goods is generally limited, still the productive labourers in the manufacturing districts are employed, to a considerable extent, and we hear of large shipments state of mercantile affairs, money, becoming more tight in the hands of capitalists and of bankers, is not surprising, the extension of commercewequiring additional investments of money, and consuming the rates of interest and discount for loans of it. Those rates were rising, at the beginning of this one, rather large sales of our unfunded national securities were made, which caused the purchasers large bills against them to be provided for, and hence, in India Bonds, as may be observed by reference to our quotations. In the share market, however, the improving demand for money for commercial purposes, has not tended to redress the confidence previously reposed in Joint Stock Bank shares. In the shares of the Brighton Railroad Company an advance of fully £4 on each was submitted to by purchasers, and much business was done in them. In those of the Great Western, York and North Midland, Derby and Birmingham, South Western, and various others, extensive business was done at improving prices. In this quarter a very extensive investment has recently taken place.

On the Foreign Stock Exchange, likewise, a great deal of good business has been done in the course of this week. A demand for Greek Bonds has arisen, which has fixed their value at 20, at previously having been scarcely saleable. The new Constitution infuses honesty into that Government, the resources of that kingdom are abundantly sufficient for raising her character among nations. The Spanish Bonds, Portuguese Bonds, likewise, the demand is improving, and so also are their prices. In the Bonds of several of the new States in America, considerable activity prevails, at prices a shade dearer than we quoted them last week. The state of the Foreign Exchanges, however, may in part be the reason for the increasing demand for European National Securities. On the Royal Exchange, last post day, the amount of Bills drawn on the Continent of Europe exceeded the demand for them, and a further improvement in the rates of the Foreign Exchanges again occurred. Gold and silver, therefore, continue to be remitted to this country in payment of the balance of commerce.

After the settlement of the time account on the English Stock Exchange last Tuesday, and fixing the next one for the 12th January, 1844, an animated demand occurred for all descriptions of Funded British Securities, and the Consols advanced fully one-half per cent. on the prices of the previous account, the prices, although at the pressure of money from without, which must continue so long as we export goods to a greater value than our imports are, and may cause a still more important rise in the value of our national debt before the conclusion of the coming year. The dividend hunters continue to expect to make as profit the Midsummer dividends, calculating on a farther rise of one per cent. previous to that period.

The transfer books for the Consols having been closed on Friday, until the middle of January, caused a slight pressure to be experienced on the Monetary system from being so, but the continuation for the next settlement of the time account being only one quarter per cent. More than the English Stock Exchange, being less abundant, commanded higher rates of interest for loans of it. On the Foreign Stock Exchange, indeed, on Friday, it was rather scarce, and the interest on it varied from four to seven per cent. per annum, according to the quality of the Security offered in security for the temporary advance. This, however, as we have frequently mentioned, is a decisive proof of commercial prosperity, and attempts at speculation are not encouraged by our reports of the progress of our improving foreign and inland trade must gradually add to the value of all descriptions of real property throughout the United Kingdom, and particularly to that of the British Funds.

BRITISH FUNDS.—3 per Cent Consols, 86¾ ¾; 3 per Cent Reduced, 86¾ ¾; Bank Stock, 168 to 172; New 3½ per Cents, 97¾ ¾; Long Annuities, 1852 ¾ per Cent; Annuities, 1859, 16¾; Long Annuities, 12¾; India Bonds, 70s, premium; Exchequer Bills, 52s to 54s pm. Consols for the Account, 86¾ ¾. Ditto for Money, 86¾ ¾. Westminster Bank, 225; Union Bank of London, 10½; London Joint Stock Bank, 15¾.

FOREIGN BONDS AND STOCK—Austrian Bonds, 114 to 115; Belgian, 104½; Brazilian, 76 to 76½; Dutch, 101 to 101½; Ditto 2½ per Cents, 51 to 52; Dutch 2½ per Cents, 54 to 54½; Ditto 5 per Cents, 99¾ to 100; Buenos Ayres Bonds, 31½; Peruvian, 43 to 45; Portuguese, 43 to 43½; Russian, 110 to 110½; Spanish, 19 to 19½; Ditto Passive, 3 to 3½; Ditto Deferred, 14½ to 15; Ditto Bonds 5 per Cent, 103; Greek, 18 to 20; Prussian, 105 to 110, Venezuela, 3½; Neapolitan, 104; French 5 per Cents, —.

THEATRE ROYAL, ENGLISH OPERA.
M. JULLIEN'S ANNUAL SERIES OF CONCERTS.

M. JULLIEN has the honour to announce that he has succeeded in effecting a New Engagement with Herr KŒNIG, who has so consented partially to abandon his projected provincial tour; Herr Kœnig will therefore perform every evening until further notice. This re-engagement, combined with the very extraordinary success of the English Quadrilles, has induced M. Jullien to extend the season until Christmas.

This prolongation will enable M. Jullien to bring forward several other novelties, composed during the past recess; in addition to which, and in order to merit the unprecedented patronage so liberally bestowed on his exertions, he has made several additions to his already extensive corps of Leaders.

MR. CHATTERTON, the celebrated Harpist, is engaged for a limited number of nights, and will perform a Solo on Wednesday evening.

The Misses FRASER are also engaged, and will appear, for the first time, at M. Prosper's Benefit, on Tuesday next, and sing one of their favourite Scotch Duetios.

The ENGLISH QUADRILLES, composed of the different styles of English Music, and introducing the effect of the Military Fifes, which has been unanimously encored each time of performance, will be played every evening.

The ROYAL IRISH and ROYAL SCOTCH QUADRILLES, still continue to be received most favourably, and will be played on alternate nights.

On Tuesday next, Dec. 5th, the Concert will be for the Benefit of M. PROSPERE, when a most attractive Programme will be presented.

Doors open at half-past Seven; commence at Eight o'clock. Promenade and Upper Boxes, 1s. Dress Circle, 2s. 6d. Private Boxes, £1 1s.

Tickets to be obtained of Mr. Reilly, Box-office of the Theatre; of Mr. Mitchell, Old Bond-street; Mr. Andrews, New Bond-street; and Mons. Jullien's Office, 3, Madder-street, Bond-street.

FATHER MATHEW, THE APOSTLE OF TEMPERANCE.

MADAME TUSSAUD and SONS have great pleasure in informing their patrons that the above exhibition has kindly honoured them with sittings for his likeness, which is now added to the Collection. It represents a three-quarter length figure, wearing the temperance medal presented by him, and they trust gives a faithful description of one to whom Ireland is so much indebted. Admittance 1s.—Chambers of Napoleon's Relics, 6d. Open during the Christmas Week from Eleven in the Morning till Ten at Night.

CHINESE COLLECTION, HYDE PARK CORNER.—The Proprietor, anxious to increase the popularity of this Exhibition, by enabling all classes to become acquainted with its wonderful contents, has reduced the price of admission to One Shilling each Person. This unique Collection, which has lately undergone a complete re-construction, consists of objects exclusively Chinese, and surpasses in extent and grandeur every display of the kind ever submitted to the public. The spacious saloon, two hundred and forty feet long, is crowded with interesting specimens of varieties. The Chinese Gallery embraces upwards of Sixty Figures as large as life, from the Mandarin of the highest rank to the wandering mendicant, attired in their native costume; also many thousand specimens in natural history and miscellaneous curiosities, the whole illustrating the appearance, manners, customs, and moral life of more than three hundred millions Chinese. Omnibuses run from all parts of London to the Chinese Collection, which is open daily, from Ten till Dusk, and from Seven till Ten. Admission, One Shilling.

NOT—ICE!!! ARTIFICIAL AND FROZEN LAKE, BAKER STREET BAZAAR.—The Subscribers to the GLACIARUM, and the Public, are respectfully informed, that in consequence of the terms of the promises expiring on the 25th of January next, and their general unfitness and deficiency of space, the Proprietors intend to FINALLY CLOSE THE ESTABLISHMENT ON THAT DAY, which he takes the earliest opportunity of making public, to prevent disappointment to those who may not have seen and admired this unlimited wonder of novelties, which, although recently destroyed by a storm of rain, has been magically re-frozen, the snow has again fallen on the mountain rocks and trees, and the picturesque glacier formed by the cascade is again in full progress, to renew the wondrous and astonishing rapidity to the sound LAKE OF LUCERNE, now re-frozen as solid as ever, and Skaters and Sceptic Visitors are invited to come and test its accommodation for skating (the only one in the world), while the opportunity offers, with the additional attraction of SLEDGES on the Frozen Lake, for the use of Ladies and Children, without additional charge; open daily, from 10 till dusk, when it is beautifully illuminated until 12 at night. A choice band, led by Mr. Sedgwick, plays every evening to numerous Skaters; and on Monday and Thursday Evenings, for four days of the Christmas Week, viz., the 25th, 26th, 28th, and 30th December, the members of the Glaciarum Skating Club will perform their elegant evolutions to music, by torch-light. Admission, 1s. Subscription for an accommodation of visitors, there will be an entrance from the Cattle Show to the Artificial Ice.—Admittance, 1s., Children, 6d.

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE

By HENRY COCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "VALENTINE VOX," "STANLEY THORN," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE MARRIAGE OF FRED AND ALICE.

IT having been arranged that Fred. and Alice should pass their honey-moon at Greville's country house, Lucrece consented to accompany her father a week before hand, in order to prepare for their reception, and as both Fred. and Alice desired to have Caroline with them, it was decided that she, Charles, the Doctor, and Major Palgrave, should accompany them to church, and then proceed to the Hall together, with the view of making up a happy family party.

Accordingly when the day arrived—that day to which all save Caroline had long looked forward with joy—they proceeded to church; but scarcely had the ceremony commenced, when Caroline—being utterly unable to subdue her feelings—fainted before the altar.

As she was falling, Fred. caught her in his arms, and, with the assistance of Charles, carried her into the vestry. Nor would he leave her until she had been restored to a state of consciousness, when the sacred character of the place, and the solemn occasion on which they had met to hear registered in heaven that vow which—in all but that which she had held to be the one grand point—she knew that she had violated, caused her to be nearly heart broken.

Eventually, however, finding that she was sufficiently recovered to render his immediate assistance unnecessary, he left her with Charles, who, with the utmost tenderness, endeavored to soothe her, and succeeded with the trembling bride and the weeping bridesmaid.

The ceremony was then most impressively performed; and when they had re-entered the vestry, Caroline and Alice were in an instant locked in each other's arms. The prompt interposition of Charles, however, prevented another fainting scene, and when the register had been signed, they left the church and returned to the residence of Dr. Hawtree.

Charles, during the whole of this time, was exceedingly thoughtful; not even when rallied by Major Palgrave and the Doctor, in a style well calculated, on such an occasion, to excite mirth, could a smile be extorted from his face. Nor could the mind of Caroline be tranquillized. She was throughout the day wretched. Not even during the journey—although the Doctor, having been implored by Fred., used every effort in his power to cheer her—could her spirits be raised, still her tears were checked, they did not flow until she had reached the Hall, when she wept and sobbed convulsively, and, despite all her efforts to suppress her feelings, eventually fainted again.

Lucrece, however, as well as Alice, attended to her then, and their combined efforts succeeded in restoring her senses; although so far at least as to enable her to sit down to dinner with calmness; and, as Fred. and the Doctor took especial care to allow no subject to be dwelt upon which was not of a lively character, they and the Major led, and supported the conversation with so much tact, that the evening passed off mirrily.

In the morning, when they met in the breakfast-room, the Major was not allowed even to speak—except on the subject of war and politics, from which source would not suffer him to say a syllable in disparagement of Napoleon. But, he managed and that, too, without Napoleon's aid—to make the whole of the party laugh at his progress, which was that of raising the spirits and increasing the happiness of them all.

And they were, with the single exception of Caroline, happy—very happy—and even Caroline appeared to be so, conscious that if she did not thus appear, she would distress them. They, therefore, spent the morning gaily. The bride and bridegroom were allowed to be a little by themselves, but not much, seeing that they usually was in great requisition.

Just, however, as the ladies began to think about dressing for dinner, a post-chaise drew hastily up to the gate, and, immediately afterwards, to their great astonishment, out stepped Mrs. Vincent Darnley!

Her appearance threw them all at once into confusion. What could be her object? What could she want there?

"That woman daughts," said Charles, "in attempting to mar the happiness of others; but this attempt—for it is one—will signally fail. I'll go and speak to her myself."

By the time Mrs. Darnley had been admitted; and as Charles was about to leave the room, a servant appeared with a message to the effect that she must see her brother instantly, and alone.

"Well," said Greville, "if she must, she must. There's no help for it. Can't account for these things—they're far above all human comprehension."

With injunctions from Charles, Fred., Palgrave, and the Doctor, not to invite her, on any account, to stay, he then proceeded to the parlour, in which source would not suffer him to say a syllable in disparagement of Napoleon. But, he managed and that, too, without Napoleon's aid—to make the whole of the party laugh at his progress, which was that of raising the spirits and increasing the happiness of them all.

"Alexander," she cried, as he entered the room, "I am ruined! lost! utterly lost! I've been robbed, Alexander! plundered! vilely, cruelly, treacherously plundered! I am now, Alexander, reduced to utter destitution."

"Why, what has occurred, Gertrude?" What has occurred?"

"That vile wretch! Oh! that abominable brute!"

"What, your husband, Gertrude? your new husband?"

"Husband, Alexander! Never assist call him my husband."

"Well, but that's the man you allude to?"

"Yes. The villain! Oh! that I should ever have been such a fool! Alexander, I shall go mad!"

"Well, but what's he been up to? What's he been doing? What is it all about?"

"Should you believe it? Would you believe it? That—I shall lose my senses, I know I shall—that wretch, taking advantage of my absence—not content with seizing out all the money I had—has sold off my whole of my furniture, and left me!"

"Well," said Greville, "there's no accounting for these things."

"No accounting, Alexander! I bring him to justice. On that I'm resolved. I'll punish him—"

"But you can't Gertrude—you can't do that!—you can't punish a man for selling his own goods!"

"His own goods, Alexander! They were mine!"

"They were, Gertrude, before you married; but after your marriage they were his."

"Don't tell me, Alexander—I know better. I'll hind the means. I can and will punish that wretch if I live. But now, Alexander, you must assist me with me immediately to town."

"To town, Gertrude—I—What for

"To assist me, Alexander, in punishing that wretch"

"Well, but—hem my soul—what good can I do? I can do no good."

"What good can I or any other woman do in an affair of that nature alone? And to whom besides you, Alexander, am I to apply?"

"But the house is full, Gertrude—the houses is full:"

"Of what importance is that?"

"Oh, I cannot with any degree of propriety—"

"Can you with any degree of propriety, Alexander, refuse to assist me?"

"Oh, I'd render you willingly all the assistance in my power; but I really don't see that I can do any good!"

"You can do good, Alexander—much good. You therefore must return with me at once."

"Well, but now that he is gone, why take any more trouble about him. Let him go. What do you want to find him for? What can you do, when you have found him?"

"I'll punish him—that's what I'll do with the wretch. Let him go! I'll find him if he is to be found upon earth."

"Well, but how can I leave? It's so awkward."

"Awkward, Alexander! Look at—position—look at it!"

"Well, well! I do look at it! I do look at it! But then—"

"I insist upon your returning to town with me immediately. The chaise is at the gate, therefore come with me at once."

"What, before dinner?"

"Now! what is your dinner when compared with my ruin?"

"I think you'd better give him up at once, and let him go about his business"

"Never, Alexander"—Never!—Now, are you quite ready?"

"Oh, but I must go up to them, you know, Gertrude!—I must just tell them that I am going."

"Then go up at once, and come down to me again as soon as possible. Don't let them come here! I'll not see any one of them. The rest may, perhaps, advise you not to go; but recollect this, I'll not leave the house without you"

Greville then slowly returned to his friends. He didn't like the idea of leaving at all! He thought it hard—very hard—and the strength of that thought increased as he explained to them what had occurred.

"And now," he added gravely, "she insists on my returning to town with her immediately!"

"Nonsense," said Charles, "Absurd! You can do no good by going to town."

"That's what I told her!" cried Greville, "word for word. But she will, notwithstanding this, drag me to town."

"But I wouldn't be dragged!—I would go to town!—It's perfectly ridiculous!" said Fred.

"If you can do no good—and the fact is, I don't see what real good you can do—don't go," said the Major, but neither of the ladies said a word: nor would the Doctor; he thought that it would be, under the circumstances, wrong to interfere.

"But look here!" cried Greve;—"look here!—she says she'll not leave the house without me, and wherever she may be I shall, you see!—that's law."

"I'll go at once, and tell her so!" cried Fred.

"My dearest love!" said Alice, "pray do not. For my sake, dear Frederick, you will not."

"But as we to be deserted," said Greville, "she's up. Fred.! shall fly at you like a wild tigress.—Well," he added gravely, "I suppose I must go. I suppose there's no avoiding that. Well, good bye, God bless you: I shall see you again, perhaps, some time or another.—Good bye."

"Well, I would not go," said Fred.; but as it was thought generally that it would be, under the circumstances, advisable that he should go, in order to avoid all disturbance which then would have been, of course, inevitably unpleasant, no further opposition was offered. They, therefore, proceeded to bid him adieu, and to express hopes of seeing him again on the morrow, but during the confusion of shaking hands, &c., the parlour bell began to ring with unexampled violence.

"There she is!" cried Greville, "I told you she was up! Well, good bye, God bless you all. Good bye, good bye."

He then calmly returned to his amiable sister, and met with precisely the reception he expected.

"Alexander ;" she exclaimed, as he entered the room, "what on earth have you been about all this time? I told you to return to me immediately! Really, this treatment is monstrous. Are you ready ?"

"Yes, I am ready, Gertrude: quite ready, I only want my hat and coat."

"Have you ordered the chaise then?"

"I have not done so yet, but I will."

"You will?" she exclaimed, ringing the bell again with violence, "Heaven pity me."

"Don't be so impetuous, Gertrude don't be so impetuous."

"Impetuous!" she echoed, pacing the room with indignation.

"Oh, I'd forgotten," said Greville, "wouldn't you like to have some slight refreshment?"

"No!"

"Not a glass of wine! Have a glass of wine?"

"I'll have nothing. Your master's hat and coat," she added, addressing the servant.

The hat and coat were brought, and when they had been assisted by Alice to put on she took his arm and hurried him down to the chaise, which they entered at once and were off.

Caroline had already won the sympathy of all around her, but when, by virtue of the kindness she experienced, she became sufficiently reconciled to act as the mistress of the house, and to perform those duties—which she well knew how to perform—with the most enchanting grace, she gradually became so endeared to them, that merging, as they did merge, almost imperceptibly, all considerations having reference to her conduct to Sir Arthur, they treated her not only with respect, but with unfeigned affection.

She was not, however, happy. She could not be happy. She was conscious of being beloved by them all, it is true; but she was sorrow by her appear in their society, happiness was, in reality, a stranger to her heart. She felt her position most acutely, and that feeling induced gentleness and amiability. She saw all around her joyous, and did all she could to increase their joy. she endeavoured, in every possible way, to increase their comfort, but although she knew that these endeavours were appreciated highly, her latent grief was not therefore the less poignant.

To be concluded in our next.

At one o'clock in the morning of the 22nd ult., a comet, only visible through a telescope, was discovered near the star Gamma, of Orion, by M. Faye, an astronomer attached to the Royal Observatory at Paris.

SOMNAMBULISM.—On Sunday morning, about half-past six o'clock, the police were surprised to see a man walking along the Strand towards Temple-bar, with nothing on but his shirt, and bearing in his right hand a candle and candlestick, like some unhappy wight about to go to execution. On being spoke, he told them that he was a stone-mason, living in Drury-lane, and had been dreaming that he was going to his work in Whitechapel.

The agents acting for his majesty King Leopold in this country have made another large purchase of prize bulls, rams, and ewes, for the purpose of improving the breed of horned cattle and sheep in Belgium. On Tuesday 12 bulls of the best English breed, 15 rams, and 30 ewes, were shipped off for Ostend on account of the Belgian government; making a total of 80 bulls, 100 milch cows, and 300 rams and ewes, that have been exported from England to Antwerp and Ostend within the last few weeks by the agents.

THE VALUE OF AN ACTOR.—The celebrated Bouffé has abandoned an engagement with the Theatre of the Gymnase, and transferred his talents to the Variétés. He does so legally, paying the penalty of 100,000 francs (£4000) to the administration of the Gymnase. This sum eventually rests at the charge of the Théâtre des Variétés; but, as its treasury could not muster the whole sum, Bouffé has authorized the latter to be repaid him out of the great profits he is expected to realise for his new masters.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—Last week's publication of this journal presents to the metropolitan public a striking and faithful representation of the most interesting scenes and prominent actors in the present all-engrossing state prosecutions in Dublin. In entering for the public taste in this particular, the proprietors have most happily ascertained the attractive nature of the subject chosen, and the ability with which the design has been executed. In fact, they have robbed the Dublin public of the monopoly of the gratification of imparted curiosity, and have afforded to the London public generally a lively and satisfactory representation of the Hibernian "lions." The venerable judges form a very pretty tableau. Their facial characteristics are faithfully defined, and they all seem, at the same time, on the qui vive, ready to pounce upon what might be expected from their ordinary quietude, by the interesting nature of the proceedings. "The conspirators," particularly the youthful ones, seem proud of their position: while on the centre of all the artist was rendered more difficult in combining fidelity, as regarded the present appearance, with the preservation of that expression of countenance with which the generality of people are so familiar.—Morning Advertiser, Nov. 27.

STRANGE COINCIDENCES.—Some days since a statesman and academician, in the course of a conversation which took place in the library of the French National Institute, observed that, in the middle of each century for the last five hundred years, some great social crisis had occurred in Europe. "In 1440," said he, "it was the art of printing which created a revolution. In 1550, it was Luther who shook the foundation of Catholicism" In 1650 it was Bacon and Descartes who demolished the infallibility of Aristotle. In 1750, it was philosophy which triumphed and prepared the revolution of 1789. We approach the year 1850, and it is evident society is preparing for some great and general renovation.

EXTRAORDINARY OCCURRENCE.—[From a Barbadoes paper.]—On the 22d of August, as the brig Rowena was lying in Lagunyea Roads, the weather perfectly calm, she discovered the vessel moving and coming among the shipping. I could not conceive what could be the matter. I gave orders to heave in and see if the anchor was gone, but it was not, but, to my surprise, I found a monstrous monster entangled fast to the buoy rope, and, moving the vessel slowly along the bottom. I then had the fish towed on shore. It was of a flattish shape, something like a devil fish, but very curious shape, being wider than it was long, and having two tusks, one each side of the mouth, and a very small tail in proportion to the fish, and exactly like a bat's tail. The tail can be seen on board the brig Rowena. The dimensions of the fish were as follows:—Length from end of the tail to end of the tusks, 18 feet; from wing to wing, 26 feet; the mouth, 4 feet wide; and its weight 3502 lbs.—C. S. DILL.

On Thursday morning the residence of O. C. Codrington, Esq., of Kilmeston, Hants, was broken into and robbed of property to an immense amount

The shop of Mr. John Randall, of Holt, Norfolk, was robbed of nearly fifty expensive watches, on Wednesday night, by a burglarious means.

The report that Mr. Emerson Tennent, M.P. for Belfast, had been appointed to a post in India, has been contradicted.

A seaman named Cole, lately returned with his ship from Guernsey, was on Thursday charged with having in his possession 2lbs. of foreign manufactured tobacco which had not paid duty. The statement made by the sailor was, that he had bought the tobacco for 10d. per lb. in Guernsey, and was taking it as a present for his brother. The magistrate, Mr. Bullantine, dismissed the case, as he was doubtful if any clause in the Customs Act would reach it.

EXAMPLES OF COMPARATIVE SPEED.

In respect to the comparative speed of animated beings, size and construction seem to have little influence. In illustration of this a few curious instances may be cited.—"The sloth is by no means a small animal, and yet it can travel only fifty paces a day; a snail will travel one hundred and fifty seconds; while the rein deer has been known to travel nine miles in one minute, length in less than an hour. "The American swan, says Audubon, "when passing with a moderate wind in its favour, and it could find no other, certainly travels at the rate of one hundred miles an hour." I have often, continues the writer, "timed the flight of the goose, and found a mile a minute a common rapidity; but when the last species, in changing its winter quarters, flies in harness, two and two with other species, in close order, it seems nearly twice as rapid, and to ride the velocity. An elk runs a mile in five minutes on safe ice can run the same distance in one; and it has been calculated that did the elephant possess the sublime power of the flea it could leap from Hyde Park corner to Greenwich at a bound, clearing the dome of St. Paul's by the way. This last instance outdoes our favourite, Carlotta Grisi.

THE POLITICAL MURPHY

An extract from G. T. F. Smith's "Parliamentary Predictions."—Fate of the Belgian Ministry. From the commencement of January, 1844, to the 28th of the month, grounded the chambers may be sitting at the time, an affecting crisis will occur to King Leopold's Ministry, tending to their complete change or resignation; and they will be defeated on a measure of great importance. This judgment is given or founded upon the same principle as enabled the author to predict the resignation of the three British Cabinets.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT.

On Thursday his Royal Highness Prine Albert, attended by Mr. Anson and the Earl of Jersey, accompanied by the Duke of Buccleuch and Sir Robert Peel, went out to shoot. The Prince first went in a boat on the water, duck shooting, and shot two ducks. He then went in a cover shooting, and killed 60 pheasants, 25 hares, 8 rabbits, and 1 woodcock. The Prince of Saxe Weimar accompanied his Royal Highness. About 200 head of game were killed by the whole party. At a few minutes past four his Majesty and Prince Albert, attended by their suite, and accompanied by the Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert Peel, and some of the most distinguished guests, left Drayton Manor for Lichfield, the inhabitants of which place did everything that their loyalty could suggest, in order to give her Majesty and her Royal Consort a becoming reception. Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, and the Duke of Rutland, were in an open carriage. On their appearance they were greeted with the most cheering. The Duke of Buccleuch, Colonel Bouverie, Mr. Anson, and other gentlemen, rode on horseback. There are two interesting circumstances connected with Lichfield, the fact of its being the birth-place of Dr. Johnson, and the magnificence of its cathedral.

At the entrance to the city, on the Tamworth side, the Mayor, corporation, and other authorities, were in waiting to receive her Majesty, and they delivered up the mace with the usual forms. Her Majesty was graciously pleased to return it. A procession of men, horses, and carriages was also formed, which accompanied her Majesty through the town. The royal party entered Lichfield at about five minutes past four o'clock, and were received in the manner enthusiasm by the people Her Majesty passed down St. John-street and Bird-street to the Cathedral, where the Dean of Lichfield and the other clerical authorities received her. Her Majesty and the royal party were then escorted over the cathedral, and all the most remarkable features among its contents were pointed out to her.

It was about a quarter before four o'clock when the royal cortége left Lichfield, on the road to Farnworth. Her Majesty, in addition to her escort of the Staffordshire Yeomanry, was attended for some distance by many of the gentlemen of the neighbourhood, on horseback.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge left town on Thursday afternoon, to honour the Right Hon. Sir Gore Ouseley with a visit at his seat, Hall Barne Park, Bucks. His Royal Highness travelled from town by the Great Western Railway to Slough.

The Duke of Cleveland has given £50, and the Duke of Sutherland £10, additional subscriptions, to Dawley (Shropshire) Church.

SCOTTISH HOSPITAL.—Thursday being St. Andrew's Day, the 176th anniversary meeting of this corporation took place at the Hall, Crane-court, Fleet-street. His Grace the Duke of Sutherland, K.G., presided. Mr. Adam, the secretary, read the report, from which it appeared that during the last year, 300 cases of distress had been relieved in each month, and pensions paid in addition to 80 aged and infirm persons, natives of Scotland. Annuities had also been granted to 65 individuals to their native land. The meeting then proceeded to elect the officers for the ensuing year. Mr. Cuming was appointed chaplain. The anniversary dinner took place in the evening at Anderton's Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, the Duke of Sutherland in the chair. The amount of the subscriptions exceeded £300, the noble chairmen being a contributor of £50, and the Rev. Mr. Cuming of £10.

DUBLIN NOV. 29.—Mr. O'Connell is to leave Dublin on Saturday, for Limerick to attend the dinner to be given to Mr. Smith O'Brien in that city on Monday. From Limerick Mr. O'Connell is to proceed to Durrynane Abbey, where he will remain until the beginning of January.

The Franklin, for Liverpool, was aground on the S. W. Bar of the Mississippi about the End ult. The Premier pass, from Quebec to Barbadoes, and the Java, from Quebec to Chatham, were wrecked near Cape Chat early in the present month: crew saved.

SIR THOMAS'S HOSPITAL.—At a meeting of the Governors on the 29th ult., Mr T. B. Burbidge was unanimously elected Treasurer, in the room of Mr. Abel Chapman, resigned, who held the office upwards of 43 years.

Mr. Horace Mason exhibited a model of an improved mode of aerial machine, at Wallis's Rooms, St. James's. There was another announced similar exhibition on the same day, which turned out to be a hoax, as we have elsewhere stated.

ANTI CORN LAW LEAGUE.—The ordinary monthly meeting of the Anti-Corn-Law League took place on Thursday evening at Covent Garden Theatre, which was, as usual, crowded by a ticket-admitted audience. The regular chairman of the League, Mr. Wilson, took his station on the central platform, with Mr. Villiers on a raised seat at his right, and Mr. Cobden at his left. Mr. Wilson opened the business of the meeting, and Mr. Cobden, Mr. Lambert (chairman of Mr. Bouverie's committee at Salisbury), Col. Thompson, and Mr. Bright, M.P., addressed the assemblage, after which the meeting broke up.

The Jury, in the Court of Exchequer, which has been engaged during a few days with the case of the Customs Information against Mr. Blake, on Thursday found a verdict for the Crown, estimating the goods in question at £1450, the effect of which verdict is to impose a penalty upon the defendant of £4500.

SAVINGS BANK.—The annual meeting of the Surrey Savings Bank, the anniversary meeting and general election of this charity, founded in 1818, by the late Peter Hervé, for granting pensions to aged tutors, governesses, and other worthy but distressed members of the middle class of society, in reduced circumstances, was held at the Freemasons' Tavern—the Duke of Richmond in the chair; when the report for the present year showed the continued prosperity of the institution.

ACCIDENT TO THE PACKET SHIP.—The new London packet ship Sheffield, Captain Popham, left Liverpool on the 5th October, with a valuable cargo of dry goods, hardware, salt, &c., consigned to R. Kermit, Esq. Arrived off Fire Island, she took a pilot on Saturday, 18th inst., who left her in charge of Mr. Fish from E.S.E. with rain. At about 1 P M., while in the act of hauling on the wind for the purpose of standing off, went ashore on the east bank, a short distance to the northward of Barnes. In a short time the sea made a complete breach over her, the ship straining very heavily. She was, however, got off on Thursday, and towed to the city by the steamers Hercules and Wave, and placed near the Screw Dock. The unexpected fortune would have fallen to any country gentleman, was held at the Freemasons' Tavern—the Duke of Richmond in the chair; when the report for the present year showed the continued prosperity of the institution.

POLICE-GUILDHALL.—On Friday, W. Morgan, a journeyman tailor, who on Wednesday made some frightful disclosures relative to the state of the tailoring trade in the Metropolis, appeared, by appointment, before Sir Peter Laurie, surrounded by a number of his fellow-workmen, when several of them made some heart-rending statements, which fully bore out the former details. Sir Peter Laurie said that he deeply sympathised with them, and hoped the investigation would lead to some good. The meeting then dissolved Sir Peter, retired.

BOW-STREET.—Yesterday a young man named Erie was charged with attempting to destroy himself, by jumping from Waterloo-bridge on the night before The policeman on duty stated that he had rescued the prisoner, and was hoisting only by his hands. He stated he was an artist, and having no where to sleep made him do what he did. He, however, refused to give his place of residence, and seemed much ashamed of his conduct. He was discharged, after a suitable reprimand.

QUEEN-SQUARE.—Yesterday a poor woman named Redburn stated to Mr. Burrell that she was in the greatest possible distress, having two children, and had only 5lbs of bread to subsist upon until the next Wednesday. Her husband had been for many years a soldier, and had a pension of 1s. 6d. a day; about a month ago, however, he received a dreadful injury, having made away with every article he could, to procure drink. She had been before two magistrates at the Sessions House, who had set aside two-thirds of the above-named sum to the parish for her support, but all she had received was 10lbs. of bread; and, to add to her trouble, she was in a very ill state of health.—The magistrate thought it was a very hard case, and sent for the relieving officer, who attended, and said he had only power to give bread, which he knew was of the same.—Mr. Burrell said he ought to do so at once; she was only asking for her own. He ordered money to be given her to purchase food, &c., in the meantime.

UNPARALLELED ATTEMPT AT MURDER.—On Friday, William Clewsley, a master turner, residing in Oakley-street, Lambeth, was placed at the bar, before Mr. Cottingham, charged with attempting to murder his wife, by striking her on the head with a hatchet. The immediate object of the prisoner's vengeance attended, with her head bound up, and, with some difficulty, gave her evidence She stated, that, about twelve o'clock, on Tuesday night, the 21st ult., the prisoner came home intoxicated. He then ordered her to leave his house, and on the present employer's stand, on the previous night, waited at the back-door of the complainant's house for his successor, whom he intended to thrash. Not, however, meeting him, and finding the door open he entered the dressing-room and ransacked underneath, the son, to wait for the boy. He fell asleep, in which state he remained till the noise of Mr. Long's entrance aroused Him. He was remanded for further evidence.

FIRE AT HOLLOWAY.—During this week a barley stack, the property of Mr. Gooch, of Horningham, has been destroyed by fire. Two hundred guineas reward has been offered.—Also the stack yard of Mrs. Brown of Rothwell, near Kettering, Northamptonshire, was destroyed, as well as a range of boat and waggon houses. Fifty pounds reward has been offered.

FATAL FIRE NEAR BROADWAY, GLOUCESTERSHIRE.—A most calamitous fire broke out in a barn and stack, on Wednesday morning, in a large farm-house, in Willersley, by which the house and furniture were completely destroyed; and the farmer's wife and five young children, and a charwoman, were burnt to death The farmer (Mr. Rissell) and three of his sons escaped through a window with much difficulty, but the rooms were so filled with smoke that the rest of the family were soon suffocated, and the mother of the children could not be prevailed upon to fly with her husband, and leave the young children to perish.

LESSONS OF THE CRIMINAL COURTS.

SILENT AND SOLITARY SYSTEM AND TREATMENT OF PRISONERS BEFORE TRIAL.

As the criminal causes progress, and the trials at session indicate the amount of innocence persecuted, or of crime offending and afflicting the community, the careful watcher of events will not fail to discover two very serious subjects for reflection and regret, both in the punishment awarded under suspicion, before trial, to those who are afterwards proved innocent; and in one savage order of that which follows conviction upon the guilty when trial is o'er. In the latter instance, we allude to the dreadful infliction of solitary confinement under the silent system—as part of the penalty often of comparatively venial offences—and always, in our conviction, too refined in its torture, and melancholy in its results, even for the more extreme cases of depravity, which it is intended to correct. We have been horror-struck at the recent reports of confirmed insanity accruing to hapless prisoners from this barbarous application of a cruelty of law. We are sure that it is not a Christian retribution, or one which Heaven can sanction from the tribunals of human justice,—to shut up the heart—to silence the spirit—to chain the tongue—to weary thought into idiocy with its solitariness—to put away the erring creature from all converse with his kind—to leave hope no utterance—despair no consolation—agony no complaint;—to bury all love in sullenness—all memory of the past in mad endurance of the present,—to set the senses riot amid a confusion of sorrows—to let the mind die out of grief into chaos—to open the gates of the brain to a wild and withering insanity—until the godhead of intellect and the grace of reason have departed—and then while what was once a man—is irreclaimably a maniac—to send him from the prison that has made him mad to rave away his existence in an asylum for the mad alone; This is a stretch of human power which Heaven would not delegate, and man has no right to enforce—and yet we hear it calmly canvassed from the lips of legislators—applauded by the bland voices of experimentalists and mock philosophers—permitted in the exercise of the legal functions of our magistrates—and in open and active operation in our prisons upon criminals, for whom it destroys their senses without annihilating their sins. In America, the dreadful system of silent and solitary confinement has created an amount of insanity perfectly frightful—and shuddering pictures of it have been drawn by travellers—and painted with dryer but still truth-speaking force, even in the reported evidence of official men. In France, it has shocked a community to whom a cruelty has not always proved repulsive—but who behold this terrible one with unaffected dread. In England it has planted its accursed foot, and already the statistics of the gaols in which it is practised are displaying insanity in letters broad and deep. To Bedlam!—to Bedlam is the common cry—and an idiot lad who was erewhile a thief in the Model Prison, may have paid with his reason for a penny roll! It is only a few days back that two boys were sentenced to spend the last week of a short imprisonment in solitary confinement for stealing a loaf of bread—while an elder lad, who was their inferred accessory, was doomed to three weeks of the same torture, to terminate a longer term of previous confinement! Verily, there was more than the pound of flesh extorted for that loaf of bread!

Under what code of morality—if we justify this sort of punishment at all—can we justify its application to the tender years of childhood? If it drives hale men mad, and breaks the hearts of old and hardened sinners, how shall youth endure it—how shall humanity suffer to see it endured? Indeed, indeed, it is a crying and a cruel sin, and let us implore at the hands of our legislators for its immediate abolition. It utterly disgraces, not only the civilization, but the Christianity of the land; it is a cancer in our criminal code, and let us, for the love of Heaven and its mercy, exterminate and cut it out. Sickness and madness are what no imprisonment should be allowed to produce, for the life and the reason of a sinning fellow-creature should be left to the disposal of God alone.

So much for our abhorrence of the solitary and silent system as it has been brought under our notice, both by the reports of insanity and the sentences at recent courts. And now with reference to the other subject of the punishment of prisoners—afterwards proved to be innocent before trial. This is a point which we are confident demands the earnest attention of society. We know that police magistrates are not always the most perfect in their law—that commitments for trial (often with a dogged refusal to take bail) are as reckless as they are frequent; that grand juries find true bills upon evidence ex-parte, and that the accused party has no chance of standing upon the justice of his country until he tries itself, be the law ever so faulty which committed him, or his own innocence ever so palpably assured. There have been several cases in point during the present sessions, of the great hardships attending upon these facts. In one or two instances, gentlemen were committed by magistrates—and when they were brought to trial the judges have stopped the case—and even the accusing counsel has intimated a doubt of whether he had really after all any charge of felony to bring! The station of life of the accused enabled them to bail themselves before the Court of Queen's Bench—but had their position been poor and humble, they must have remained in Newgate for nearly a month—instead of for the four days only, for which as it was they were confined. Now for rich or poor, wrongfully accused, this is a deplorable hardship—and we contend lustily that there should be some intermediate place of confinement provided for persons not brought to trial. To be obliged, when perfectly innocent, to undergo the discipline of such a gaol as Newgate—to herd with persons accused of every crime—to sleep in their corrupt society and shudder at their ribald mirth when you would fain that all lips around you were stirred by prayer alone—to be debarred the visits of friends—to partake only the felon's diet, to perform the menial offices awarded to all prisoners—without distinction of former condition or rank—to be consigned "far, far, behind thick-ribbed and tripled gates," at four o'clock in the afternoon to your sleepless couch—to feel yourself surrounded by all the elements of terror—breathing the very atmosphere of guilt and death—to know that in consigning you to that dungeon Ruin has given you her first embrace—and society will shun and the world know you as one who has been in Newgate for some crime, of which its charity will not pause to enquire whether you were acquitted or not—to endure all this is something more than innocence is prepared for, or justice should expect. Yet all this is undergone by prisoners waiting for trial, week after dreary week—and when, at last, the consolation of acquittal meets them—or the judge stops the case, and impliedly informs them that they had no business to be there at all—they tearfully or indignantly ask themselves, "Why! why! have we suffered this bitter degradation?"—and society returns them neither a reply nor a redress!

This is not a civilized way of clearing the approaches to justice, and we repeat, that nothing is more imperatively required than a proper distinction between "before" and "after" trial,—and a fair and considerate treatment of all classes of prisoners as innocent, until a jur of their country shall have pronounced them guilty.
